I feel as though they are paying for their actions, but I don't feel like the general public is being treated fairly.

There are thousands of young men and even younger boys who dream of playing football.

Many of them are being attracted by the growing program here at K-State.

This is a tribute to the well-run, clean program here.

However, the message that is currently being sent to these future football players is a wrong one.

I would like to appeal to Coach Bill Snyder as a coach, but more importantly as a person who cares about young people and the future of our University and the community, to publicly denounce violence and senseless retaliation by anyone.

I would also encourage him to publicly announce the punishment that was given to the three, possibly more, current football players who have been charged with such senseless violence.

This would send a message to all who currently play and all who would play in the future that such behavior will not be tolerated at K-State, but more importantly, that such acts of violence carry consequences that must be dealt with.

Our society is much too violent. Coach Snyder, please seize this opportunity to address it and send a message to the future.

I would respect you even more than I do now if you would do so.

CLIMBING LADDERS

Women in the '90s are making huge strides in political, economic and social arenas

Women have traded the aprons and brooms of the 1960s for the briefcases and political clout in the 1990s.

Women are no longer expected to get married, have children and keep house. But they are instead making tremendous strides in the formerly male-dominated business and financial fields.

One advocate of women's rights is Grammy award winner and author Naomi Judd.

"I want women to remember peace of mind is the goal. The cure is possible even with the incurable," she said.

Women of the world will bring the change of tide, she said.

"Women are willing to heal themselves first, then we can heal the world," she said.

Women must empower themselves, and not allow men to empower them, she said.

"I feel very strongly that women are the answer to today's world," she said.

Women are more in touch with the true issues that face the world, and women are much more willing to listen to their intuition and be more expressive, she said.

Judd said only you have control of yourself. "Control is a superstition. Your security comes from God," she said.

Women in America are already on a spiritual quest and a quest to further their successes, she said.

"Women are in the prime seats for influence because of the positions we're in, like nursing, homemakers, secretaries, and doctors," she said.

When we, women, stand together it is going to be our finest hour. 'We' is the important part, Judd said.

"Women in college must know this," she said. "Women are the deal."

Judd said she has written only one song since retiring from the entertainment industry.

"It is an a capella song called 'Stepping Into the Light,' and it should be on Wynonna's next album," she said.

The song is about peace of mind and reaching goals, she said.

"This is an inspirational song for all," Judd said.

When it comes to women and their involvement with world peace, Ada Aharoni said women are just as important to the peace process as men are, and it is time the world started to take recognition of that fact.

Aharoni, an award-winning poet, lecturer and U.N. peace activist from Israel, said women are the best allies for peace.

"Women are not part of the machine of war. We don't build the bombs. We don't arm the soldiers. Those in charge don't ask us about war. Yet women give men life," she said.

Women, together with men, could bring advancement and significant changes in the world, she said.

"Men are not used to the idea because there is a lack of knowledge of what women can do," she said. Norman Fedder, distinguished professor of theater, said women were good for peace.

"Women suffer the most from war, and they can be the strength in stopping wars," he said.

Women tend to communicate through words, and men tend to communicate through force, he said.

In a conflict, connectiveness, which tends to be a female characteristic, is more conducive in moving toward peace or a resolution than from the view point of competitiveness, which as a rule is a male characteristic, with an emphasis on the individual rather than on the group, Nancy Goulden, assistant professor in speech communication, said.

"We are socialized to have different perspectives on the world," she said.

In the professional and political world of women, advancement and success can bring supporters and opposition.

This is what Dr. M. Joycelyn Elders, former U.S. Surgeon General, ran into during her time in office.

"Women have appreciated me standing up for women's rights," she said.

Elders was the first African American woman to be Surgeon General.

Elders said she started her process of integrating herself in the male-dominated society back in 1959.

"I was the only female, a black female at that, to graduate from medical school," she said.

Elders said the jobs she has had have greatly influenced the women's rights movement.

"Being a black Southern woman probably helped me throughout my career, too," she said.

The first thing women in college need to be aware of is getting through school, she said.

"Then, women should take on a task that will not overburden themselves," she said.

Right now, women and minorities can only go so high, she said.

Women are aware of the problem, they just have to be the advocate, then they can find the solution, she said.

"We need to come together and unite," she said.

Elders said she has four steps women should always remember when they are trying to climb the ladder of success.

"Be good to yourself, do not forget where you came from, do not be afraid to take risks and do not be afraid of failure," she said.

Former governor Joan Finney was the first woman to be in the highest public office in Kansas. Her term as governor was from 1991 to 1995. She has been in the business government for more than 40 years.

Finney said she has worked at the local levels and has also served as Kansas State Treasurer for five terms.

"The real strength is in 10- and 12-year-old girls who will not tolerate the position women have been in," Finney said.

Until she was elected, traditionally, governors had come out of the legislature, she said.

Finney said a woman's input is just as good as a man's input and said it was an important aspect in governing.

"It is important in government to have input from the yin and the yang," she said.

Men and women think differently, and government needs both inputs to be representative of society, she said.

Finney said one woman cannot make all the changes that need to be made. She then referred to Shannon Faulkner the first woman to be accepted in to the Citadel and her long battle to get into the school.

"You need several women to bring change," she said.

Finney said the reason she was able to sit with a group of men in a conference room and have a voice while she was governor was because she was the boss.

"This is not always true for a member of a group," she said.

Finney said young women starting to climb the career ladder should be aware and cautious in the business world until more of them are on corporate boards.

"Women will loose out in the privatization of businesses," she said.

Finney said she was tired of people like Rush Limbaugh putting down women continually.

"Because men have had the power, they have not studied the problems women have had to suffer," she said.

However, Finney said, fathers are learning not to hold back their daughters from achieving their goals.

"They do not want to see their daughters put down or held back because of their sex," she said.

Women should be themselves and not try to be like men in the business world, she said.

"They should not be one of the good ol' boys," she said. "Because they are not."

Men will find women will stand up a little more to opposition, she said.

Women who want to work in government have been fairly successful because they are able to reach the community, she said.

"Women need to come into politics, law, journalism, engineering and the medical fields to help improve the economics of women," she said.

These are the areas of employment where women can have the greatest effect.

There is also a primary need for women in those fields, Finney said.

"Women should get the recognition they deserve," she said.

In her term as governor, she appointed many women to positions that had never been occupied by women before in the state government, she said.

"I developed a trust with the people," she said.

Finney said she wanted to leave a good record for young women, so when they come along, they can say "she did do good," she said.

"I left with a good record, I met and kept all my promises," she said.

In the long run, Finney said, she believes her work in government will benefit everyone.

"In the future, we will have more women in the position of power, whether it be in business or in government," she said.

The feminine perspective could be extremely beneficial to humanity, she said.

MORE SEATS FOR K-STATE VS. OU GAME

K-State athletic officials announced Monday that 4,400 additional seats will be sold for Saturday's game against Oklahoma. The seats will consist of folding chairs in the north end zone and bleacher seats around the concourse.

As of Monday, only 300 single-game tickets remained. The price for all tickets is $20. Kickoff time is set for 1:10 p.m. Saturday.

Goal posts, Miller's hair and other Cat questions answered

Football season is quickly winding down, and it's time to answer some of the most frequently asked questions from Wildcat fans.

Question: Should the goalpost have come down on Saturday after a 41-7 victory against No. 6 Kansas?

Answer: No, with an explanation. Don't get me wrong, I like tearing down goalposts as much as the next guy.

But Wildcat fans need to become a little more selective of when the posts come down. Cat fans made a statement when they charged the field Saturday after the Cats' 41-7 thumping of Kansas, but the possibility was there for so much more of an exclamation point.

The single greatest thing Cat fans could have done was in unison as the final gun sounded, stand, turn their backs to the field and exit quietly from KSU Stadium without saying a word.

I say this not because I don't want the goalposts to come down, but for a better reason. What bigger slam could we place on the Jayhawk fans than to show them we don't even really care about beating them anymore?

We should have shown them that beating KU isn't even something to get excited about because it has become almost commonplace.

Hawk football fans would have nothing to do if they didn't have this rivalry. If Cat fans didn't care and treated the Sunflower Showdown as nothing more than a formality, KU would have nothing to get excited about over the fall months if the rivalry was taken away from them.

From now on, Cat fans, let's focus our attention on Nebraska and Colorado and not waste our time getting all worked up over that traditionally weak red and blue bird from Lawrence.

Question: Mike Lawrence or Eric Hickson at running back?

Answer: Play both. Benching one to play just the other would be one of the silliest things this team could do. The Cats are in one of the greatest situations possible with opposing defenses always guessing. Let's keep it that way.

Question: Can this team go 10-1?

Answer: Yes, but not definitely yes. Oklahoma is struggling and should be the easiest win the rest of the way. The road game Nov. 11 at Iowa State could be tougher than it looks on paper. If the Cats overlook the Cyclones to the next week's game against Colorado, the Cats could be in for a long afternoon. But then again, the Iowa State offense is not that complex ... Troy Davis left, Troy Davis right, Troy Davis up the middle.

The Cats can beat Colorado the following week, but it will be a battle. So, yes, this team can go 10-1, but it can't look past three tough remaining regular season games toward a possible New Year's Day bowl game.

Question: If the all-Big 8 first team was picked today, who makes it?

Answer: Definitely are wide receiver Kevin Lockett, defensive tackle Tim Colston, defensive end Dirk Ochs, linebacker Percell Gaskins and cornerback Chris Carty.

But don't be surprised if wide receiver Mitch Running, defensive end Nyle Wren and the rest of the secondary don't get strong consideration. Also, don't overlook quarterback Matt Miller. Miller could be the only thing standing in the way of Nebraska quarterback Tommie Frazier's first all-conference selection.

Question: How does Miller rate with only three games left on the slate?

Answer: A-. A quarterback is judged, Miller told me once, by his team's record. The Cats are 7-1, and Miller is getting the job done. He leads the Big 8 in total offense and keeps finding ways to win.

And more importantly, a top-10 quarterback's hair has never looked so pretty in the pocket.

Miller's quote of the year was Oct. 21 after the team's 49-25 loss at Nebraska.

"I like how your hair's coming too, Todd."

Thanks Matt, thanks a lot. Things are looking good for you. From one pretty man to another.

Volleyball team to hit the road to face top-ranked Nebraska

► Coach Jim Moore's 16-7 Wildcat volleyball team will rematch No. 1 Nebraska tonight after losing to the Huskers earlier in the season in three games.

Look for coverage of the match in tomorrow's Collegian.

For the second time this season, the K-State volleyball team will be traveling north to Lincoln.

And for the second time this season, the Wildcats will be facing No. 1-ranked Nebraska.

The 16-7 Cats will take the court against the No. 1-ranked Cornhusker team, which is 19-1 overall. K-State is 3-5 in the Big 8, and Nebraska is 9-0 in the conference.

K-State coach Jim Moore said that although he does not expect a win in Nebraska, he hopes the team performs its best.

"The chances of beating Nebraska at Nebraska are very, very slim," Moore said. "I expect them to play the best they can play. That's all I can expect."

If the Cats defeat Nebraska, the prospect of attending the NCAA tournament in November is relatively promising.

However, if the Cats return to Manhattan with another Big 8 loss, the team will have to win the remainder of their matches to have a legitimate shot at the tournament.

The last time the two teams met, Nebraska defeated the Cats in three games, 4-15, 6-15, and 8-15. The Husker squad has won 51 straight matches against K-State.

Moore will be looking to K-State's leaders to threaten the Huskers.

In the last match, freshman blocker Val Wieck hit .471 with 10 kills, two digs and four block assists. With her recent impressive performances, Cat fans can look to her to make an impact on the court. Wieck is hitting a solid .370 on the season with 284 kills.

Along with senior hitter Jill Dugan, Wieck has the team high of 12 solo blocks. She also has 91 block assists.

Junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk also contributed to the last match, hitting .250. She also had six digs, three solo blocks and four block assists. For the season, the former Player of the Week is hitting .378 with a team high 272 kills. She also has recorded 211 digs, third best on the squad.

Freshman hitter Kim Zschau had the team high 11 digs and two block assists. Along with Wieck, Zschau has made a solid contribution to the Wildcat team this season. For the year, she has 214 digs, second best on the team, and 228 kills, hitting .200.

Cats not going to overlook No. 25 Sooners

Ryan O'Halloran

It's happened before. A team blows out its rival in a must-win situation, thinks highly of itself following the win instead of concentrating on the next opponent and consequently, loses the next game to a beatable opponent.

And eighth-ranked K-State is in position for this scenario to take place, but Coach Bill Snyder said Tuesday his team is over its 41-7 Kansas win last week and has 25th-ranked Oklahoma fully on its mind.

"We practiced last night, and I thought we practiced relatively well," Snyder said at his weekly press conference. "It was business at hand. I think they were focused on Oklahoma, and I think the Kansas thing is behind us, which it should be."

Following the Nebraska loss, K-State was able to put that blowout behind and concentrate on its rival from Lawrence, but shouldn't it be tougher to do so after a big win over the Jayhawks?

"You've got to learn with the wins and losses — successes and failures — and I think we have," Snyder said.

"Obviously, the youngsters responded quite well, and I don't think we treated that ballgame any differently than the last one — we just played better."

"Where they are now emotionally is positive, confident and yet very understanding that we have three extremely difficult games ahead of us."

If K-State wins its final three games over the Sooners, Iowa State and Colorado, it would leave it at 10-1 and with a chance at the Cotton Bowl. But the bowl situation isn't on K-State's mind because it's out of the team's hands.

"There isn't anything we can do about it," Snyder said. "All you do is play and hope that you can win, and if you win, it all takes care of itself. The only thing we have control over is to be fortunate to win game by game."

"I know what the circumstances are for the most part, and I share with our team prior to the beginning of each week basically where we are and what possibilities exist, and then we attempt to put it behind us."

But although most of the bowl stuff is out of its hands, K-State can hold its own destiny in one way.

"The only way that we have control over that is by winning," Snyder said. "There are no guarantees below the first- and second-place teams in the Big 8, and that's speculation," Snyder said.

"But I think that's accurate."

K-State can continue to dream the New Year's Bowl dream with a win over Oklahoma (5-2-1) Saturday at KSU Stadium.

The Sooners are led by first-year coach Howard Schnellenberger. Oklahoma started 3-0, but went 1-2-1 in its next four games before beating Missouri 13-9 last week.

When he was at Miami (Fla.) and Louisville, Schnellenberger orchestrated a passing attack engineered by Jim Kelly, Bernie Kosar and Browning Nagle.

But during his first year in the Sooner Nation, Schnellenberger has stressed the running game.

"Howard had always been a coach who worked a great deal with the passing game," Snyder said. "I certainly didn't follow his teams when he was at Miami and Louisville until after he took the job at Oklahoma. He does what he needs to do. He's coached for a long time and plays to what his personnel is capable of doing."

This season, Schnellenberger has had to play to a running style. Oklahoma is averaging 241.5 yards on the ground a game, good for third in the conference behind Nebraska and Iowa State, and 163.8 through the air.

Sooner running back Jerald Moore is second in the conference behind Iowa State's Troy Davis, averaging 123.9 yards a game. If Moore can be stopped on Saturday, K-State will have a better chance of winning, but it's easier said than done.

"He has all the talent that all of the quality backs we've faced have," Snyder said. "And he has it in a 228-pound body that's very compact. He's such a hard, hard runner that he's a hard guy to tackle. He has quickness and is elusive but also has the ability to run over people."

With a team like Oklahoma next up, Snyder said looking past the Sooners on the part of his team won't be a problem.

"They're a very, very good football team," Snyder said. "So I don't think overconfidence has been a problem for us."

► NEBRASKA PLAYER TO STAND TRIAL ON WEAPONS CHARGES DESPITE HIS CLAIM OF DOUBLE JEOPARDY

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Nebraska cornerback Tyrone Williams must face trial on weapons charges before he can argue the charges are unconstitutional, the Nebraska Court of Appeals ruled today.

Williams, a senior cornerback from Palmetto, Fla., was accused of firing a gun Jan. 30, 1994, in Lincoln at a car occupied by New York Jets safety Kevin Porter and a woman. No one was injured.

Williams was charged with unlawfully discharging a firearm and using a weapon to commit a felony, but his case was put on hold while he appealed the charges.

Williams said prosecution for the two charges would constitute double jeopardy because the two charges are similar. Double jeopardy, or punishing someone twice for the same offense, is unconstitutional.

In a 3-0 ruling, the Appeals Court dismissed the appeal and said it was premature for Williams to raise the issue. Judge John Irwin wrote that the court has no jurisdiction in the matter because Williams has yet to be tried.

Once that happens in Lancaster County District Court, the judge said, the Appeals Court could consider the questions.

"Williams' double jeopardy right not to be punished more than once for the same offense will not arise until such time as the district court may enter a verdict of guilty against him on the two offenses and the jeopardy of multiple punishment attaches," Irwin wrote.

"It is possible that, in the event of a guilty verdict on both counts of the information, the trial court may have to confront the possible double jeopardy implications," the judge wrote.

► MARLINS PLAYER OK AFTER BEING SHOT IN SHOULDER

TAMPA, Fla. (AP) — Florida Marlins outfielder Gary Sheffield appears to be all right after being shot in the left shoulder during what he called a robbery attempt.

The 26-year-old was treated and released from a Tampa hospital Monday night. At first, he said, he knew he was hit by a bullet, but he didn't know where.

"It did sting," he told the Palm Beach Post from St. Joseph's Hospital in Tampa. "It hit me in my left shoulder. When they cut my shirt open, the bullet fell out. The doctor said I was lucky I had the kind of windows I have in my car. I think it's double glass."

Sheffield said he was stopped at a traffic light about 7 p.m. in the Belmont Heights neighborhood where he and his uncle, New York Yankees pitcher Dwight Gooden, grew up when a teen-ager sprinted toward his white 1993 Mercedes-Benz.

"I just thought it was a friend of mine running at the car," Sheffield said. "I let the window down some to see who it was. Then I saw him pull a gun, and I turned to the side. He shot the gun, and it hit me in the shoulder."

"He was trying to open the door. Then he said, 'Give it up! Give it up!' I faked like I was hurt and was laying down. I surprised him and pulled off. Then I went and called for help."

Although Sheffield called it an attempted robbery, police had no motive.

"There doesn't seem to be any reason at all," officer Diane Coles said. "According to Mr. Sheffield, he was just sitting at the light with his window up and someone came up and just shot him through the vehicle."

Sheffield, a two-time All-Star, signed a four-year, $22-million contract with the Marlins in 1993.

Last year, despite another injury, Sheffield hit .324 with 16 homers. He was the National League batting champion in 1992 while with the San Diego Padres. He was traded to the Marlins during the 1993 season.

► KC CHIEFS ACTIVATE FULLBACK DONNELL BENNETT

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Donnell Bennett, a second-round draft choice of the Kansas City Chiefs in 1994 who was just coming into his own when he suffered a serious knee injury in December, was activated Tuesday.

Bennett, who was injured Dec. 18 in a game against Houston after scoring his second career touchdown on a 12-yard run, was activated from the physically-unable-to-perform list.

He had suffered torn knee ligaments and had surgery in January.

Linebacker Frank Stams, who signed as a free agent in September, was released to make room for Bennett.

Bennett had resumed practicing, and NFL rules required the Chiefs to activate him within three weeks of his return.

"The most important part about coming back from an injury is having your mind mentally set that the injury is over, that the body is 100 percent," Bennett said. "That way you can just concentrate on moving forward and not have to think: 'Did I train hard enough? Is the knee going to hold up?'"

Bennett returned to practice Oct. 10. "It's felt like it's been two or three years," Bennett said. "It's been horrible."

Bennett is a bruising runner at 6 feet, 245 pounds.

The fullback had gained 178 yards on 46 carries at the time of the injury. Bennett, who played at Miami, had seven catches for 53 yards.

"Donnell's a great football player, a guy who was really making progress when he got injured," Chiefs coach Marty Schottenheimer said. "I'm excited that he's coming back. I'm excited about what he is going to bring to this football team."

The Chiefs also said quarterback Steve Matthews and linebacker Jerrold Willard have begun practicing with the team. They were on the non-football injury list.

Quebec premier plans to resign

Associated Press

MONTREAL — Stung by defeat in the secession referendum, Quebec Premier Jacques Parizeau said Tuesday he plans to resign. He also apologized for blaming the loss on non-French immigrants.

Parizeau maintained staunch support, however, for the separatist cause that has been at the heart of his long political career. He said his Parti Quebecois would choose new leadership capable of achieving independence for the mostly French-speaking province.

Parizeau, 65, was elected premier last year after promising to hold a referendum on secession. His side lost Monday, but only narrowly — 50.6 percent to 49.4 percent.

But at a time when the separatists could have been taking heart at their strong showing, Parizeau shocked even his allies with a bellicose speech at campaign headquarters, blaming the defeat on immigrants.

"It's true we have been defeated, but basically by what?" Parizeau said. "By money and the ethnic vote."

Parizeau's co-leader in the separatist camp, Lucien Bouchard, distanced himself from the ethnic remarks Tuesday, signaling that the premier's position had become untenable.

Parizeau expressed regret for his phrasing, saying he used terms that could have been better chosen. But he reiterated his view that Quebec's French-speaking majority had, in effect, been thwarted by non-francophones.

About 90 percent of English-speaking and immigrant Quebecers opposed secession, while French Quebecers — who make up 82 percent of the population — voted for independence by a 60-40 margin.

Earlier Tuesday, Bouchard — a possible replacement for Parizeau — scoffed at an offer from Prime Minister Jean Chretien to negotiate a new status for Quebec.

"Never again will sovereigntists be begging for anything from the rest of Canada," Bouchard said. He said Quebec would sit down for talks with Canada only after winning a future independence referendum.

Chretien, chastened by the razor-thin federalist victory Monday, said he would try to get other provincial premiers to support changes that would decentralize the government and recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

Bouchard described his reaction to Chretien's offer as boredom and big yawns.

"Nobody's going to get us sovereignists involved in another 30 years of sterile discussions," he said.

Bouchard reiterated the separatists' promise to mount another independence drive. Current Quebec law bars a new secession referendum until after new legislative elections, but separatists control the legislature and could change the law.

■ Sunset Zoo assists in Paraguayan wildlife protection

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Sunset Zoological Park is working to protect wildlife and make zoos better in Paraguay.

Five years ago, a 35-year reign of dictatorship in Paraguay ended. It has marked the beginning of a new democratic life — and wildlife.

Paraguayan President Juan Carlos Wasmosy met with Sunset Zoo officials Saturday.

Two special-interest groups have been working to establish relations between Paraguay and Sunset Zoo.

Bob Klemm, chair of Paraguay Fauna Interest Group and retired K-State professor of zoology, said the interest groups were special committees designed to help coordinate the conservation and scientific activities of American Zoo and Aquarium Association institutions.

Klemm said the interest groups were conservation programs working with non-governmental organizations. He said they were zoo-related through the association.

Paraguay is just one of seven countries that has association interest groups.

Forty-two members make up the U.S. interest group, and there are another 42 in Paraguay. Klemm said these individuals are all experts in a particular field and are available for consultation.

Angie Fenstermacher, Sunset Zoo's marketing and development director, said Kansas was the conservation partner to Paraguay. The counter partner to Kansas is the Comité Paraguay.

"Through this, we've been able to establish a relationship with Paraguay and through the zoo in the area of wildlife," Fenstermacher said.

Klemm said it wasn't always that way. He said the relationship between the United States and Paraguay happened by chance when Sunset Zoo was visited by an individual active in Kansas Partners.

The Partners of the Americas is a United States Agency International Development project and was an outgrowth of President John F. Kennedy's Alliance for Progress, Klemm said.

"She visited Sunset, met with us and was totally enthralled," he said. "We were showing her what little things you can do to make a zoo look good."

Paraguay wondered if the Sunset Zoo would be interested in upgrading the Asunción Zoo within the botanical gardens in Paraguay, Klemm said. After the Sunset Zoo decided to help them, he was on his way, he said.

"Before I went down, we formed an official zoo relationship between Asunción and Sunset, which was recognized by AZA," Klemm said.

Klemm said the Sunset Zoo spoke with association officials and the Conservation Breeding Specialists Group to suggest that a interest group be formed, which was approved in 1994.

"After our visits to Paraguay, we set up the interest group," he said.

Klemm said once he was down at the Asunción Zoo, he began to assess its condition, turned in a translated report to the zoo officials and followed up on their progress.

Klemm worked directly with zookeepers, zoo staff and supervisors for three weeks in Asunción Zoo. He said they worked on exhibit design, nutrition, animal care and developed a complete master plan for Paraguayan zoos.

"We started working primarily on an administration level, but we made major recommendations for short and long term," Klemm said. "We felt we could do this because 15 years ago, Sunset Zoo was in the same position."

Klemm said Sunset was faced with the decision to either renovate or close. Klemm said Sunset was an excellent and highly accredited zoo.

Klemm had also been asked to assess the level of conservation actions that had been developed in Paraguay and found virtually none, he said.

"Most zoos in the U.S. have habitats, not cages," Klemm said. "Their zoos were deplorable."

Klemm said Asunción Zoo has shown remarkable improvement in little more than one year.

The zoo has built a 17,000-foot aviary, dredged a plant-clogged lagoon, renovated monkey houses, enclosed a large exhibit, enlarged and redesigned cages and painted silver screening black so glare is non-existent.

"In 15 months, that zoo has turned around. It's almost unbelievable," Klemm said.

Asunción has requested the zoo be properly fenced and separated from the Botanical Gardens and that a small admission fee be charged so it's appreciated more.

Klemm said he thought Paraguay was a lovely country with diverse ecological regions and extreme climates with both dry scrub forests and lush tropical forests. But he said 95 percent of the land in Paraguay is privately owned.

"You can conserve more because for one thing, there is a law that says those who own property must show productive use of it or have it taken away," Klemm said. "We're hoping Paraguay will develop a wildlife-conservation management program," Klemm said.

Klemm said once it does, it can submit projects to the Sunset Zoo and other zoos and ask for funding and receive expert consultation.

He said part of the conservation effort was a captive breeding program. Klemm said Paraguay has difficulty ensuring that highly-endangered jaguars and exotic birds won't be poached or captured.

"It's not the ideal thing but may be the only way to maintain them," Klemm said. "Exhibiting animals is important because it educates."

He said as part of the Sunset Zoo's conservation program. It has 15 repositories for endangered species.

"The next project is to bring a Paraguay administrator, preferably a zoo biologist, to let them work in our zoo," Klemm said.

Klemm said the Kansas/Paraguayan relationship resembled a wonderful serendipitous happening. But he said it was a pity that this program is more known internationally than in Manhattan.

He said that in the zoo world, the Sunset Zoo has been nicknamed "the little giant" because of its world-renowned efforts to improve zoos and animal living.

"You can't put a dollar value on it," Klemm said. "What Kansas gets in return is a little intangible. We get a sense of satisfaction that we're doing what zoos now are expected to do."

Shuttle tests provide clues to atmosphere

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — An experiment flying on space shuttle Columbia could provide clues to what happens to dust clouds in the atmosphere and the process by which planets and stars begin forming.

Astronaut Fred Leslie shook small containers of dust samples so scientists could better understand how dust clouds form and dissipate.

Geologist John Marshall said Tuesday from NASA's Marshall

FINE ARTS SPRING ALLOCATIONS REQUESTS

It is time for groups to submit applications for funding of events or projects for which you would like assistance from the Fine Arts Council. As you may or may not know, the Fine Arts Council was created by the Student Senate to establish more fine arts programming on campus. This money is generated from the Fine Arts privilege fee students pay each semester. A reserves account is created that assists in the programming efforts of student groups promoting fine-arts related programming.

The forms that need to be filled out are available at the OSAS Office. THE DEADLINE FOR APPLICATION IS ON OR BEFORE TUESDAY NOVEMBER 21, 1995 AT NOON (12 p.m.).

Beatlemania returns to U.S.; hype machine cranking away

Associated Press

The band that once sang "you never give me your money" will soon be rolling in it.

With this month's three-part ABC-TV documentary and the upcoming release of three compact disc packages of archival material, the Beatles will be everywhere. The hype machine is cranking overtime.

"They've really created a plan where everywhere you go, everything you look at and everything you listen to is Beatles, Beatles, Beatles," said Toni Lee, spokeswoman for Grey Entertainment, the advertising agency putting it together.

Buses decorated as yellow submarines will roam city streets. ABC-TV is calling itself A-Beatles-C. Theaters will show ads before movies. Even people who call Ticketmaster will hear Beatles songs when they're put on hold.

Beatlemania revisited is expected to be lucrative for Paul McCartney, George Harrison, Ringo Starr and Yoko Ono.

Forbes magazine predicted the three surviving ex-Beatles and the estate of the late John Lennon would earn $130 million this year, ranking them third on the list of best-paid entertainers. That's astounding money for a group that broke up 25 years ago and only in the next few months will release its first "new" music since then.

Although the Beatle dolls and Beatle wigs of the 1960s pioneered rock 'n' roll merchandising, its former members lately hadn't taken much of an interest in keeping the band alive in the marketplace.

The amount of Beatles CDs and memorabilia has dwarfed those of such artists as Elvis Presley and the Rolling Stones. There are only two greatest hits packages, known as the "red" and "blue" albums for their covers, and even those occasionally are discreetly taken off the market.

Experts suggest that's part accident, part design. The former Beatles still have trouble agreeing on business matters and make a lot of money even in quiet years where there is little Beatle activity; Forbes estimates about $12 million a year for all of them.

"They simply don't overexpose and oversaturate," said Stephen Dessau, president of Track Marketing Partners, a music marketing firm. "They make millions of dollars year in and year out on the catalog but they don't bastardize the product."

Of course, this only whets the appetites of devoted fans when there are new products to sell. And there will be plenty.

Home videos of the Beatles documentary, with about four hours of material not used on ABC-TV, will be for sale next year. Capitol Records will put all of the anthology CDs into a boxed set that will be on the market for Christmas 1996.

Late last month, the Beatles' management firm reached an exclusive merchandising deal with Sony Signatures, a company that has developed products for Barbra Streisand, Bruce Springsteen, Janet Jackson and others.

Dell Furano, president of Sony Signatures, is betting that the schoolchildren who toted Beatle lunch boxes to school in the 1960s will pay up to $500 for framed lithographs of Beatles album covers to hang in their offices.

The company soon will be churning out Beatle ties, Beatle watches, Beatle clocks, Beatle greeting cards, Beatle plates and Beatle posters.

Framed wall hangings, of such items as posters advertising Beatle tours and never-before-seen photographs, are expected to be popular. He expects to generate $200 million in retail sales by the end of 1997.

"We're finding a lot of kids, children of the Baby Boomers, who want to buy presents for their parents and vice versa," Furano said.

About the only thing out of the Beatles' control, oddly enough, is the use of their songs for advertising. The Lennon-McCartney song catalog is owned by Michael Jackson, much to McCartney's chagrin.

McCartney criticized Jackson for using "Revolution" in a sneaker advertisement a few years back. Dessau, who licenses music for corporate clients, said he expects Jackson will be selective in who is allowed to use Beatle songs, figuring he doesn't need more bad publicity. It's also expensive, he said.

"When people ask about a Beatles song, we say don't even think about it, don't even bother approaching them," he said.

Salina campus starts new tradition

Jamie Willey

Wildcats at the K-State-Salina campus are rallying for the Big 8 finale during their campus Homecoming Week activities.

This year marks the first time since the campus was established that it has participated in Homecoming Week activities.

Students living in the residence halls and faculty members can enter a door-decorating contest by simply decorating their doors, Jake Greenup, coordinator of student life, said.

"It's to get people fired up about K-State and Homecoming," Greenup said.

Doors that use lots of purple and wildcats will score highly in the decoration contest.

On Thursday, the Heart of America Bone Marrow Donor Registry Inc. will be testing interested students for their bone marrow type, Mary Calentine, public information officer, said.

Michael Meier, a former K-State student, died of leukemia in 1992 before a donor could be found. His parents donated money for K-State to have a bone marrow testing drive so other people suffering from leukemia can find a donor if they need a transplant, Calentine said.

The purpose of bone marrow testing is to add names of possible donors to a data bank. Anyone needing a bone marrow transplant could then be matched with a donor, Calentine said.

"It is a volunteer program, but hopefully, only people that are truly interested in being a donor should be tested," said Diane Lux, manager of donor recruitment for Heart of America Bone Marrow Registry Inc.

The participants of the testing drive will be required to fill out a form, watch an informative video, read information and undergo a quick health screen before being tested.

the bone marrow only amounts to about two tablespoons and takes only 20 seconds to get.

The bone marrow test is painless and should take about 30 minutes, Lux said.

The bone marrow testing drive will be from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the College Center.

A reception for Ken Barnard, K-State-Salina aeronautical department head, will also be held during the Homecoming Week activities.

Barnard has been selected to receive the Kansas Governor's Aviation Honors Award.

Calentine said Barnard has been an aviation instructor for K-State-Salina since 1977. She said he was receiving the award for his promotion of the aviation program at the campus.

Barnard is also responsible for securing approval of a new four-year bachelor of science degree in aviation and Federal Aviation Association approval of an airway science program, Calentine said.

The instructor will be available at noon on Friday in the dining hall at the Salina campus.

On homecoming day, K-State-Salina is sponsoring a bus taking alumni and friends of the college to watch the Cats play Oklahoma.

Calentine said the tickets for the bus sold out after K-State beat KU last Saturday.

After the game, K-State-Salina will host a reception and dinner for alumni, which will include comedian Vince Champ, Calentine said.

On Sunday, the campus homecoming activities will come to an end at the Purple Pride Brunch.

Architecture leader takes interim seat

Becky Klenken

staff reporter

A new head of the Department of Architecture was appointed after Eugene Kremer's unexpected resignation in July.

Susanne Siepl-Coates was asked by the faculty of the Department of Architecture to take the position temporarily in July and has now been formally named the interim department head.

"On such short notice, Susanne has truly stepped up to the task," Wendy Ornelas, assistant professor of architecture, said.

"She has been very professional in the way she has approached the governance of the department. It is nice to have someone with such a fresh outlook to head our department at this time."

Siepl-Coates came to K-State on a temporary contract from Germany in fall 1984 as an assistant professor in the department of environmental design.

She applied for a tenure track position and in 1990 became an associate professor and associate head of the Department of Architecture.

While on tenure track, professors are under supervision for the first six years of their full-time appointment. During these years, they are evaluated each year on their performance in teaching, research and service to the University, college, department and community. If they meet specifications, they are tenured.

"Serving as an interim department head on such short notice is difficult at best. Susanne serves her department well. She is doing a fantastic job," said Dennis Law, interim dean of the College of Architecture Planning and Design.

Artist's jungle of colors captures Latin America

Portia Sisco
staff writer

Enter a vivid jungle of colors in Alfredo Arreguin's collection "Viva la Vida." Arreguin's paintings are showing in the Union Art Gallery from Oct. 30 to Nov. 17.

The collection consists of 13 oil-on-canvas paintings and one ink-on-paper drawing.

Arreguin's subjects are traditional, but his style is unique. His subjects include people, animals and religious pieces in bright primary colors.

Arreguin uses shapes and faces to create patterns, objects and sometimes people.

One example, titled "Tapate," resembles an elaborate quilt of shapes and colors. It is the largest painting featured in the collection.

The religious piece in this collection is called "Madonna Afro-Latina." A dark woman stands in the center, her arms spread wide in welcome. Her skirts form a wide bell shape against the colorful background. A halo adorns her head.

Animals and wildlife are an important part of each of Arreguin's paintings. In "Nuestra Senora de la Selva (Our Lady of the Jungle)," a mother holds her infant son.

Monkeys swing from the trees overhead, and a jaguar sits at her feet. Exotic birds and butterflies encircle them.

Alfredo Arreguin's paintings are unique because of his use of color and shapes. Arreguin's painting "Cholula" presents symmetrical faces that resemble brightly colored tiles. Each face is painted in a different color with a different expression.

"Sacrificio na Amazonia (Sacrifice in the Amazon)," inspired a poem by Marit Bockelie of Seattle.

Arreguin uses dark colors to create the illusion of night in the jungle. Animals prowl the night next to a pool of water. It is the darkest piece in this collection.

Latin America is closer than you think. Arreguin's art gives everyone a chance to experience his home through his paintings.

Barbara Johns, senior curator of the Tacoma Art Museum, created the exhibition "Viva la Vida."

Arreguin's works are showing at K-State courtesy of Exhibit Touring Services, a part of Eastern Washington University's College of Fine Arts in Cheney, Washington.

This jungle of colors is worth seeing.

Volunteers assist children

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

About 60 K-State students will be giving some of their time to children out of school for parent-teacher conferences this week.

"It's difficult for parents to find someone to care for their children," Linda Teener, executive director of UFM, said. "We use K-State students because we have such a small staff and not enough resources."

UFM has offered enrichment activities for a number of years to children whose parents work all day or just want something for them to do during parent-teacher conferences, Teener said.

Children in kindergarten through third grade will be participating in activities at Woodrow Wilson School both Thursday and Friday.

"We do a lot of things with the younger children," she said. "We have outdoor activities, science projects, art, a tae kwon do demonstration, as well as a pet demonstration."

The children will also be touring the post office this year, she said.

Children in fourth through sixth grade will be at K-State Thursday, Teener said.

"For the older kids, we have Kids On Campus," she said. "It's been very successful, and the kids really enjoy it."

Teener said they have done activities in the past like entomology, storytelling projects and visits to the greenhouses.

"This year, we'll be going to the computer labs," Teener said. "There's also the chemistry magic show that they just love."

The older children will also be touring Bramlage Coliseum and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, she said.

Kathy Chandler, associate education educator at UFM, said the older children will be touring Wonder Workshop on Friday.

"Wonder Workshop is a children's museum where all the art is hand-drawn," Chandler said. "They can go through it and spend a whole morning there."

Teener said the program was a good way for K-State students to get hands-on experience by doing something that might relate to their courses of study.

"It's an edifying place where children can go and learn," said Beth Putnam, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education. "It's a good experience for them, but also for me, and it's kind of a change of pace."

Chandler said the activities will be from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., and all parents need to register their children at UFM to participate.

The cost is $20 per child, and there is a discount with more than one child. There are also scholarships that the parents can apply for when they register that will pay half of the fee, Chandler said.

"It's been very successful in the past," Teener said. "It's fun to work with the kids, and it's nice to get positive feedback from the parents who really appreciate the help."

► WORLD WIDE WEB

MIT, Web creator work to improve technology

Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Like many people who achieve something spectacular, a myth has grown about Tim Berners-Lee, creator of the World Wide Web.

He's not a physicist. He's just a software engineer who wanted to make his work easier.

But he's often portrayed as a physicist because he developed the Web while working at the European Particle Physics Laboratory, known as CERN, and the physics community was the first to embrace it.

But now, more than a decade after he came up with the idea, the Web is used by millions of people with computers connected to the Internet, the global computer network. Entertainment and information — not science — is the aim of many users who browse a colorful collection of Web sites every day.

Companies of all sizes display products and public information on their sites. And thousands of individuals have their own Web sites, where they show favorite photos, poetry, opinions on entertainment, news or sports or demonstrate some type of expertise.

Berners-Lee said he believed the technology that is now a novelty to many people will be taken for granted in a few years. And he is working toward that end.

British-born and educated, the soft-spoken programmer left CERN a year ago to join the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which helped form a consortium of more than 90 companies and institutions to fund the development of technical standards for the Web.

The consortium's members are also dealing with many of the issues that reflect the public's anxiety about on-line communication — like security, intellectual property protection, free speech, anonymity and authenticity. They're working on the Web of the future.

The group is expected to come up with innovations to help rate Web content the way that movies are and to allow users to do more things on a Web page besides reading it and jumping to another.

Many members of the World Wide Web Consortium, especially companies like software and computer makers, see the coming changes as a way to make money quickly.

"We have short-term pressures from companies that need to get products out to market very rapidly, in a ridiculously short time scale when compared historically," Berners-Lee said.

"And at the same time ... we have to be aware that we're doing something that has got a lot of long-term implications. So when we hold a workshop, we've got a tremendous number of ideas that we're trying to balance."

One sign of the Web's growing importance is that more than 3,000 people are expected at the fourth conference for standards development here next month. That's compared to 300 at the first gathering, held early last year.

The Web represents a major step toward getting information anytime and anywhere, the oft-discussed promise of computers and communications.

But for all of its sophisticated technology, the Web is still in its youth, the medieval part of the dream, said Michael Dertouzos, director of the MIT Laboratory for Computer Science, where Berners-Lee now works.

"Between the steam engine and the jet engine, there were 230 years," Dertouzos said. "Let's be patient. Between the start of computing and today, there's been 35 years, depending on your definitions. We've got 170 to go. We're just about to discover internal combustion."

What remains constant is the main idea behind the Web — that computer-accessed information can easily be associated or linked to other information regardless of where that other information is.

"In many ways, the scale of the Web hasn't changed," Berners-Lee said. "The fact that there are millions of people instead of thousands of people doesn't change it very much more than the fact that there were thousands instead of three."

The story of the Web began in the early 1980s, when Berners-Lee created a simple program to help him keep track of other people and projects at CERN. It relied on hypertext, highlighted words that doubled as a command to a path to related information.

The big step came years later, when Berners-Lee had encouraged many colleagues to use his program. The hypertext was combined with a communications network, which meant the extra information didn't have to be on the same computer as the original.

Over the past two years, it has seemed that the power of the Web appears to have been grabbed by corporate marketers and creative college students. But more companies are realizing the data-linking concept can help them change their internal computer systems. They are finding it frees them from forcing workers to act in a way that is dictated by a computer's limitations.

"The reason the Web works is it doesn't have indications about how we structure ourselves," Berners-Lee said. "Every time you first make a system and build an organization around it, you're constraining the organization. The organization may not be able to move. If you use hypertext, the organization can change."

He said he is eager for the Web to evolve in a way that allows people to have much more direct interaction with it. Web pages can be designed with an ordinary word processor that has an extra feature, often available for free, for writing the hypertext, or HTML, commands.

But the next step are pages that can be annotated by people who are reading them and shared within a group, similar to the way that Lotus Notes and other groupware programs work.

"We're looking for a time when we have common data that groups of people can play with together and come to a group understanding or group knowledge," Berners-Lee said. "That was part of the original vision that we've been a little distracted from."

Other goals include placing an ingredient into Web content that permits a rating symbol. The Web Consortium won't do the rating. They are just trying to make it possible for a Web site developer or a third-party rating agency to declare whether material is proper for all or should be designated for a limited audience.

A step beyond that is to make Web pages capable of being sorted by a computer, meaning they would become machine readable. One use for that capability would be if co-workers were holding an electronic discussion about a project, including hypertext links to supporting materials. A manager could ask the computer to map out the discussion and see how it developed, where the sticking points were and who worked best with whom, Berners-Lee said.

"That would have tremendous value, particularly with global reach."

K-State ambassadors candidates

Burgess

Mike Burgess is a sophomore in public relations.

K-State is making cat-tracks as it prepares for the 21st century. And with every step it makes, I want to be there to represent the student body.

I would like to serve as ambassador because I love K-State and enjoy working with people.

It would be an honor to share my experiences and all of the great things about K-State with prospective students and alumni.

As a student-athlete on the track team, a public relations major and a Public Relations Student Society of America member, I have traveled to other universities and seen what they have to offer. There is no comparison. The outgoing people of K-State make the difference.

K-State has a very competitive, yet supportive, atmosphere. We have a great tradition, and we are taking steps to prepare for all of the changes taking place in the world today.

Purple pride is what sets K-State apart and what will carry its greatness into the future.

Urbanek

Matt Urbanek is a junior in economics.

Pride.

That is why I want to be a K-State ambassador. Ever since I was a child and attended basketball games in Ahearn Field House, I was aware of the overwhelming sense of pride students have. However, I never dreamed that becoming a student at K-State would expose me to so many wonderful friendships and experiences. As a K-State ambassador, this is the message that I want to relay to potential K-State students. Those students represent the future of this great University, and if I can give them just a small taste of K-State through my experiences, I think it would sway them to Manhattan.

The purple wave of pride does not end at graduation. I see many parents bring their children to K-State football and basketball games, much like my parents did. If it were not for such caring alumni, we would not have many of the athletics or academic facilities available to us today. Part of their pride stems directly from the accomplishments of everyday student activities, and I want to inform alumni of those numerous achievements.

Graff

Jennifer Graff is a junior in agricultural economics.

There is a feeling, a sense of pride, that circulates among all who call themselves "Wildcats." This spirit is catching, and at some time will touch all of us on this campus. We have carried on a great tradition of excellence at this University through the years of the Big 8. From academics to athletics, we have become the pulse of the Midwest.

If given the opportunity to be an ambassador for K-State, I will maintain and enrich the relationship between the students and the outside community by upholding the traditions of the past while ensuring progress for the future.

Fisher

Renee Fisher is junior in public relations.

P is for the PEOPLE who bring the character to our campus.

U stands for the UNEQUALED honors our University claims.

R screams ROAR! as Cats' pride ignites.

P is for PRESTIGIOUS scholars and athletes — part of our KSU tradition.

L is for the LOYALTY that we will always have for our school.

E is for ENTHUSIASM as fans now crowd the stands.

From the first time I visited Manhattan, I knew this should be my collegiate home. With a rich history, friendly students and an optimistic future, K-State was the only choice for me.

As an outstanding institution for higher education, K-State's energy, enthusiasm and excellence will continue for years to come. For this reason, I would be honored to receive the opportunity to represent our school as an ambassador. By promoting K-State's tradition with pride, I would dedicate myself to the position.

Serving as an ambassador is not just a responsibility, it is a privilege. The advancement of our University is an obligation I would not take lightly. With enthusiasm as untamed as a Wildcat, I continue to be loyal to the purple and white as well as dedicated to you, the students. Good luck with the rest of Homecoming.

Tanner

Mariah Tanner is a junior in consumer and family economics.

From the Sand Hills of western Kansas to the capital, people need to know what a top position K-State has in the Big 8, nation and world. In the past, we have achieved many marks of excellence through academic programs, athletics and great people from a variety of backgrounds. Through different experiences in many areas on campus, I have gotten to know this spirit of success. As ambassador, I will carry this professional excellence into my job.

K-State offers an opportunity for students to achieve their dreams. We must continue to invite top students to K-State to achieve their potential academically and to contribute to student life. Alumni support is needed not only financially, but also morally to keep traditions alive.

By maintaining strong leadership among students and alumni, we are successful. I have witnessed generations of K-Staters pursuing rewarding lives in my family and community. This gives me an unbeatable amount of pride with which to represent K-State. Of course, the real excitement comes in representing the many students I have met through numerous activities and classes.

The new K-State Ambassadors will be announced during the halftime of the University of Oklahoma vs. K-State football game.

Voting takes place Wednesday through Friday in the K-State Student Union.

The ambassadors represent the K-State student body at official University and alumni events during the next year.

Halloween is the busiest time of year for Chicago-based skeleton company

Associated Press

CHICAGO — Marshall Cordell can call up the names of his skeleton crew with ease: Petite Pete, Tiny Tim, Mr. Thrifty and Max.

They don't make any bones about working, though, because their normal duties consist merely of hanging around and looking scary.

Cordell's company, Anatomical

Chart Co., sells more than 30,000 skeletons a year. They're mostly plastic, but he does sell about 300 real ones — all named Max. His customers include Hollywood studios, police departments and even a Caribbean resort looking to startle scuba divers.

But Halloween — with the parties and haunted houses that require fake frights — is the backbone of Cordell's business.

"Halloween without skeletons is like Christmas without Santa Claus," Cordell said Monday.

Cordell, 48, bought Anatomical Chart in 1970, when the company made only charts for medical schools. The company, based in the Chicago suburb of Skokie, expanded to become a retailer of novelty gag and scare items, such as real-looking severed limbs and brain- and heart-shaped gelatin molds.

Skeletons still support the business, however. Eight-inch plastic skeletons (Petite Petes) sell for about $9. Six-foot sets of real bones are imported from prisons and nursing homes in France and sell for about $2,300.

Selling bones has given Cordell enough ghoulish moments for several Halloweens.

Once, a customer placed a skeleton bought from Cordell in the trunk of a car and set the car on fire.

Cordell had to reassure police officers who found the charred bones and a box from Anatomical Chart that the blaze was probably an ill-inspired prank.

"I feel normal around Halloween," he said. "It's like Halloween every day of the year around here."

Costumed kids run crime racket in Manhattan

I'm mad as hell, and I'm not going to take it any more.

I'm about fed up with juvenile crime in this country. Even little Manhattan isn't exempt from pre-adult lawlessness.

Tuesday night, Manhattan was rocked by a crime wave. Maybe you weren't aware of it, but it's about time someone spoke up. I guess I will.

This didn't happen to me, but it did happen to many of my neighbors. What was going on amounted to nothing more than extortion and racketeering by children.

Here is their modus operandi: The children went from house to house in the most garish, gory disguises demanding to be given things under the threat of vandalism. The disguises are no doubt meant to try to intimidate people and as conceal identity, not unlike the antagonists in the movie "Point Break."

These kids, ranging from toddlers to young teen-agers, had a kind of code phrase to let you know what they were after. They would knock on the doors of their neighbors and yell, in the most piercing voices they could muster, the phrase "trick-or-treat."

Or so I'm told. This "trick-or-treat" phrase is as clear an attempt at extortion as any tried by the likes of John Gotti. This phrase means that these extortionist children were demanding a "treat" (often in the form of candy) and if they didn't get said "treat" they would perform a "trick." These were not magic tricks they were offering, but criminal acts of vandalism. The children were essentially demanding that residents give them candy or risk vandalism of their property.

Can you believe a community like as Manhattan's would put up with such depravity? One must wonder: Where were the parents of these children while they were racketeering their neighbors?

You might be shocked to learn many of these parents were helping their children commit the crimes.

Indeed, I am told that some of the younger racketeers (so-called "trick-or-treaters") were accompanied by their parents.

Perhaps this extortion is actually the work of candy-hungry adults who put their children up to do their dirty work. After all, if their children get arrested for vandalism or racketeering, they'll face only a slap on the wrist. Adults undoubtedly would be fined or jailed for such gangster activity.

Maybe it's time to throw the book at these little trick-or-treaters. Maybe it's time the Justice Department got into the picture.

The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) Act may apply here. This federal statute seeks to make it easier for extortionists to be put behind bars. RICO might just put some of these school-aged racketeers out of commission.

Someone ought to call up Attorney General Janet Reno at the Department of Justice and let her know small-town America can no longer be victimized by juvenile racketeers who come out on a Satanic holiday to extort candy from their neighbors.

It's our community. Let's take it back, folks.

grates real-time video of all remote users, full duplex audio, meaning that everyone can hear and speak at the same time, and applications sharing.

Application sharing allows charts, photos, illustrations and text to be viewed by all users simultaneously. It also allows for the sharing of programs and file transfers.

Two additional features are found with desktop videoconferencing. The whiteboard, which functions like a traditional classroom blackboard, allows users to write and draw simultaneously. The message board allows students to send questions directly to the instructor.

Because two or more users can work on the same spreadsheet or document, people in different locations can easily collaborate on a project, Biles said.

The added dimension of real-time video is an important aspect of videoconferencing.

"One thing I like about it is that students maintain eye and body-language contact with the instructor this way," said Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology.

She said desktop videoconferencing might eventually be used on campus to bring students classes that otherwise would not be available. In a large classroom, a projection screen will replace the computer monitor.

The connection between computers is made through a conventional telephone call using a more cost-effective phone line called Integrated Services Digital Network.

Once TELENET moves from its leased phone lines to ISDN, all calls made within an area code in Kansas will be local calls. This should save TELENET about $50,000 a year in phone bills.

Funds for the equipment and connectivity of the system have come from the Kansas Cooperative Extension Service, some host sites, including 13 community colleges and all the regents schools, a grant from the Rural Utility Service and a grant from the Kansas Criminal Justice Anti-Drug program, said Sue Maes, a member of the K-State Technology

Task Force.

"The purpose of the grant is to deliver professional continuing-education courses and seminars to employees of local police and sheriff departments from the police training academy near Hutchinson," Biles said.

The cost of a desktop videoconferencing unit is about $3,000 for the computer and $3,000 for the additional hardware and software.

The classes will be operated out of the regular TELENET budget, but the lower telephone bills will save money, Biles said.

Dennis Franz, director of curriculum and development for the Department of Defense and National Science Foundation grants being implemented at K-State-Salina, said no one else is really using this technology in education right now, and it needs curriculum designed to make the applications fit.

"Through the grants, we have put together a curriculum development team," he said. "They will be contracted with to develop and design an instructional technology that matches this technology."

Greek Affairs prohibits members of the varsity cheerleading squad and Classy Cats to compete in body building.

"Basically, there were a bunch of people who had never done any of this before, so we had to start from scratch," Tijerina said. "We had to start with the basics, like walking with their hands down and holding the girls up."

Tijerina said this year's competition would be a lot more exciting than some of the years past.

This year is a new turnover year because most of the participants are younger, have never done it before and create a lot more excitement, she said.

Because danger is involved with some of the body building stunts, some rules and regulations have been set up by Greek Affairs for the benefit of those involved.

"We have a height restriction of the height of two average people," Kori Keeton, junior in political science and Homecoming coordinator for Greek Affairs, said. "There is also a maximum of 25 people on the mat at one time."

Team members must also remain in constant contact with another team member. This ensures that no dangerous flips or throws occur during the competition.

Teams are also encouraged not to dog pile or rush the judges, and spotters are also required during the routines.

"There are four criteria that we use and all are equally weighted," said Matt Urbanek, junior in economics and vice president of External Affairs.

"First, they are judged on the effective use of body movement. Then, they are judged on their enthusiasm and creation of spirit. They are also judged on their utilization of the five-minute time limit and their skill and execution of the routine."

Another requirement for anyone watching or participating in Thursday night's competition is an effort to help the community.

Each person attending or participating is asked to bring on canned food or one non-perishable food item, Urbanek said. The food will be donated to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"We want to show the students that we are proud of everything that's happening at K-State," Urbanek said. "It's good to show the importance of community relations and we're looking for escalated participation."

Body building preliminary rounds are set to begin at 7 p.m. Thursday at Ahearn.

The top five teams will be chosen by a panel of three judges to compete in the finals, which will be held at 7:30 Friday evening at Wagner Field, followed by a bonfire and pant-the-chant. During the finals competition, a panel of three different judges will choose the top team.

Terry said the co-op can still function, but it is not going to be able to fill classes because of the machines that are down, said Terry.

The Department of Communications is trying to repair the computers with the missing parts. Terry is unsure when it will be able to replace the laptops.

"On the notebook computer, we'll just have to wait and see where funds will come from," said Terry.

Spirit

coming spirit is needed to show support for the athletic events.

"I think Homecoming is important. There is a lot of tradition. But I work and don't have the time," Rocco Demarino, sophomore in history, said. "Players need to know how much the students support them."

Students might enjoy the live, high spirit events of body building and pant-the-chant, but others, including faculty, like the creativity of the spirit banners and yard art.

"The banners that are put in the Union always have some new and creative things. I look forward to seeing what will be put up this year," said Robin Loader, Information Systems Coordinator for the Union Bookstore.

As the end of the week nears, excitement continues to rise as students involved show their spirit.

"Months and months of work has gone into this, and we'll be seeing that all come together when the groups compete to see who has the most Homecoming spirit," Urbanek said.

Though most of Canada welcomed the outcome of Monday's vote, Quebec was uneasy. Montreal police reported 40 arrests after supporters of the rival sides brawled, and a homemade bomb was found at offices of the federalist Liberal Party. No one was seriously injured in the street fighting, police said.

There was little celebration in the federal capital, Ottawa, where Chretien met with his Cabinet to discuss the impact of Monday's referendum.

The federalists' narrow victory kept Canada intact but drove home the message that Quebecers, and many other Canadians, want big changes in the federal system.

Space Flight Center in Huntsville, Ala., that his experiment demonstrated that tiny dust particles behave the same way in space as they do closer to Earth.

He said the particles clump together because of static electricity and form chains.

In an atmosphere like Earth's, these chains and bigger clumps fall to the ground.

NASA said this could affect how long clouds of dust would linger in the atmosphere after a big volcanic eruption or a catastrophic meteor strike, like the one theorized to have been involved in the extinction of dinosaurs.

"The more we know about the behavior of these clouds, the better prepared we might be to deal with them," Marshall said.

NASA said the same process could be involved when dust particles begin clumping together in space to begin the process of forming stars and planets.

Columbia's astronauts spent their 11th day in space completing Marshall's experiment and conducting more fluid and crystal studies.

The 16-day mission ends Sunday.

Are you at risk for diabetes? Could you already have diabetes and not know it? Take the Test. Know the Score.

Write in the points next to each statement that is true for you. If a statement is not true for you, put a zero. Then add up your total score.

- I have been experiencing one or more of the following symptoms on a regular basis:
    - excessive thirst Yes 3
    - frequent urination Yes 3
    - extreme fatigue Yes 1
    - unexplained weight loss Yes 3
    - blurry vision from time to time Yes 2

  - I am of Hispanic or Black descent. Yes 1
  - I have a parent with diabetes. Yes 1
  - I have a brother or sister with diabetes. Yes 2
- Total _____

Scoring 3-5 points:

If you scored 3-5 points, you probably are at low risk for diabetes. But don't just forget about it. Especially if you're over 40, overweight, or of Black, Hispanic, or Native American Indian descent.

What to do about it:

Be sure you know the symptoms of diabetes. If you experience any of them, contact your doctor for further testing.

Scoring over 5 points:

If you scored over 5 points, you may be at high risk for diabetes. You even may already have diabetes.

What to do about it:

See your doctor promptly. Find out if you have diabetes. Even if you don't have diabetes, know the symptoms. If you experience any of them in the future, you should see your doctor immediately.

The American Diabetes Association urges all pregnant women to be tested for diabetes between the 24th-28th weeks of pregnancy.

This test is meant to educate and make you aware of the serious risks of diabetes. Only a medical doctor can determine if you do have diabetes.

Rec Report

Kansas State University, Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex

November 1995

Watch for our full page ad on the 1st day of each month for program information and monthly calendar of Recreational Services Events!

Pool Action

Aqua Aerobics is gaining in popularity. The evening sessions of Wildcat Waterworks are being moved to 8 p.m. on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday to accommodate the interest. Participants experience support and buoyancy in the water which decrease exercise impact to joints and the spine. However, exercise intensity is increased from water resistance. Certified aquatic exercise instructors combine aerobic and toning exercise for a well-rounded workout. You do not need to be a swimmer or get your hair wet for this unique type of aerobic exercise.

Wednesday, November 1, at 8:30 p.m. is this month's Stroke Mechanics Workshop. If you would like help with your swimming strokes, sign up at the Natatorium.

Sunday and Wednesday evenings throughout November, the 6-lane pool will be used for Intramural Inner Tube Water Polo. The 8-lane pool and diving well will be open for recreational swimming.

NOTE: The pools will be closed Thursday through Saturday, November 23, 24 and 25.

WILDCAT WATERWORKS

Aqua Aerobics Deep Water Jogging
Mon/Tue/Thu Wednesday
11:30 a.m. & 8 p.m. 11:30 a.m. & 8 p.m.

The new 1/8 mile elevated TRACK at the Recreation Complex is OPEN. Come ✓ it out.

Nutrition Notes

"Fig bars contain twice as much fiber and less than half the fat calories of most cookies. Still, they are high in sugar and calories, so save them for occasional treats." The Wellness Encyclopedia from the editors of the University of California, Berkeley, Wellness Letter.

My favorite workout

Amy Shay, senior in elementary education, has been using the Recreation Complex since coming to Kansas State. Amy participates in the aerobic sessions, in addition to running approximately four miles per day. Her favorite type of aerobic session is the step aerobics. "The high and low impact provides a challenging workout," she said. Working out provides a stress reliever and opportunity to evaluate things for Amy. She enjoys the numerous sessions available, the new aerobic room and expanded facility. "With a nicer facility, it makes it more fun and enjoyable to work out," she concluded.

Sit Back and Enjoy the Ride!!

As part of our expanded weight and fit area, we now have 26 recumbent bikes from four different companies. Presently we have six StairMaster Spinnakers, eight Cybex Semis, eight Lifecycle 9500R, and four CyclePlus recumbents. The Spinnaker Semi, and 9500R are classic recumbent style bikes. They each operate a little differently, however, they all tend to be more comfortable with the feel of actual bike riding. The design of the recumbent bike is to allow you to achieve greater aerobic conditioning with less quadricep fatigue and reduce stress on the knees. The CyclePlus includes upper body conditioning by involving the arms as well as the legs. Stop by and try a recumbent. It is one of the most popular cardiovascular machines in the fitness industry.

$ Spring '96 $ JOB OPENINGS

To be eligible for the following positions, you must be a Kansas State University student enrolled in a minimum of one credit hour during the Spring semester. Graduate assistants are not eligible for employment.

- assistant building supervisors
- weight/fitness area supervisors

Application forms available in the Recreational Services office.

Working It Out

"You CAN do it! It's time again for the Wildcat Workout annual canned food drive and Thanksgiving exercise sessions. You CAN Workout for you and you CAN make a difference for local families this Thanksgiving. Donations of canned food will be collected for the Flint Hills Breadbasket at all exercise sessions Monday and Tuesday, November 20 and 21. Exercise and have a CAN-do attitude.

Call Rec check at 532-6000 for days and times exercise sessions are offered.

NOTE: There will be no exercise sessions Thursday - Sunday November 23-26.

Who's Who at Recreational Services

Jason Hickson, senior in marketing from Goodland, Kansas, has been employed as a building supervisor for a year and a half. "From my experience at the Recreation Complex, I've learned to handle a variety of customers," he said. What he enjoys most about working at the Recreation Complex is the friendly atmosphere and meeting new people. Upon graduation Jason would like to be a sales representative for a corporation which manufactures and sells fitness equipment.

Quentin Hurst, native of Topeka, Kansas, has been employed in a computer support position for two and a half years. Hurst, senior in accounting, has gained experience in project management through his employment at Recreational Services. "I enjoy the responsibility and freedom given to me, plus I've gained on-the-job experience," he said. Aside from work, Quentin enjoys fishing, watching "CHIPS" reruns and ESPN. Following graduation in December, he will begin employment with Arthur Anderson Accounting Firm in Kansas City. Quentin and his fiancée are also planning a January wedding.

Members of the Russian 27th Guards Motorized Rifle Division take a moment of silence while visiting President Dwight D. Eisenhower's grave inside the Place of Meditation at the Eisenhower Museum in Abilene Wednesday morning. The Russian guards are participating in Peacekeeper '95 and took some time off to see some of the area's historic sites before they leave on Friday.

A PEACEKEEPING Mission

■ Russian troops visit
Czars exhibit, Hypermart

Associated Press

TOPEKA — Russian troops, thousands of miles from home, got a flavor of Moscow in the Kansas capital during a tour of the Treasures of the Czars exhibit.

Then they got a flavor of the United States by taking a trip to Hypermart on the west edge of Topeka.

Tim Ross, co-director of the store, said they seemed impressed. "They were here for about an hour," he said. "They had never been in a building this large as far as a retail establishment. You could tell by the looks on their faces."

Others who did not go to Topeka visited the Eisenhower Presidential Library in Abilene instead.

It was the next-to-last day of the historic joint training exercise with both Russian and American troops, the first such exercise on U.S. soil. Fifty-five Russian soldiers participated.

Called Peacekeeper 95, the training exercise focused on the types of military operations that might be used to maintain peace in Bosnia. Closing ceremonies will be Thursday.

At Abilene, Russian troops toured the president's museum, taking a few moments to look at the ivory dagger presented by Soviet Marshal Georgi Zhukov to Eisenhower after World War II.

While Zhukov commanded Russian troops on the Eastern Front, Eisenhower was supreme Allied commander.

"I've studied Eisenhower and know his history very well," Col. Nikolai Malyshev, 44, said. "He liked Zhukov personally, and their friendship continued throughout their lives."

Also on display at the museum was an Order of Victory medal presented by the Soviet Union. Malyshev said fewer than 25 have been awarded.

In Topeka, about 80 Russian and American soldiers visited the Kansas Museum of History, then the Czars exhibit, which includes more than 270 artifacts from the Romanov Dynasty.

Many of the artifacts, which include the Cap of Monomach used to crown Peter the Great in 1682, have never been outside Russia.

The Russians had been scheduled to tour the exhibit at 2:45 p.m., but arrived at about noon and left shortly before 2 p.m. Then they went shopping.

Col. Yuri Mamchur said the tour of the Treasures of the Czars made him feel like he was in Russia.

"Our life in Russia is so eventful that sometimes you can see more in America," he said through a translator. He also said he would like to see exhibits about American history in Russia.

He said Hypermart offered the same range of goods that some stores have in Moscow.

"It's a very good shop, very big," he said. "All the choices are very great."

A couple soldiers bought microwave ovens, he said, while others bought cameras. Mostly they bought souvenirs.

"But most of them just took a good look on the inside," Mamchur said. "The prices for some goods are sometimes lower in Russia."

► ROBBERY

Freshman robbed

■ Student hit from behind in Lot B-2, suffers minor injuries, fracture

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

A robbery was reported in Lot B-2 Tuesday afternoon.

Janet Bozarth, freshman in modern languages, reported the robbery at 7:41 p.m. Tuesday. The robbery occurred between 3:45 p.m. and 4 p.m. Tuesday afternoon.

Lot B-2 is north of Haymaker Hall and is reserved for residence hall parking.

K-State police have filed the incident as a strong-arm robbery. Sgt. Andrew Amaro said. A strong-arm robbery occurs when an assailant uses physical force rather than a weapon to steal from the victim.

"It's something we haven't had occur here for a long time," Amaro said.

The victim was struck from behind as she walked from Moore Hall to Lot B-2 Tuesday afternoon. She had a bump on the right side of her head, but there was no evidence, such as lacerations, that a weapon had been used, Amaro said.

"She was hit from behind, and she saw no one," Amaro said.

She told police she remembered a sharp pain in the back of her head and then blacking out, he said.

"I was thinking about what I needed to get from Wal-Mart," she said. "It was foggy and rainy. Suddenly, I felt a sharp pain in the back of my head."

When she came to, she was lying on a grassy island in B-2.

"My head was on the concrete, and my feet were on the grass," she said. "My purse and things were in front of me."

JUSTIN STAHLMAN/Collegian

When she came to, she was dizzy, her arm hurt and her head was pounding.

"I remember thinking, 'I've just gotta get help for my arm,'" she said.

The victim went back to Moore and went to Lafene Health Center at the urging of her friends. She had minor injuries, including a bump on her head, skinned palms, an injured knee and a fractured left arm, she said.

At first, she thought she had just blacked out, Amaro said.

"She really didn't realize she was the victim of a mugging," he said.

She did not discover she had been robbed until

Players claim innocence

■ Students will return to court on Monday for hearings

Dan Lowrenz
sports editor

Preliminary hearings concluded for K-State football players Percell Gaskins, Brian Kavanagh and Nyle Wiren Tuesday. Each claimed innocence through the voice of his attorney.

Each was charged with two counts of battery and one count each of criminal trespass, criminal damage to property, conspiracy to commit battery and cruelty to animals.

"Mr. Gaskins is not guilty to each and every count," Attorney Steven Opat said.

"My client enters a plea of not guilty to all counts," Meryl Wilson, attorney for Wiren, said.

Both will be in court again Monday. Gaskins will have his hearing at 10:30 a.m., and Wiren's hearing will be at 2:30 p.m.

Attorney Robert Pottruff, representing Kavanagh, said he was unable to enter a plea for his client at the time of the hearing.

"I've been through the written reports with my experience of 15-20 years," Pottruff said. "I've read these reports, and I've read these complaints thinking I was overworked at the time so I took another day to read the reports again. I still have yet to find in any of these reports what any witness has to say that in any way would implicate my client."

"Our position is that my client is not guilty of any criminal offense."

At that point, Pottruff indicated he had filed a bill of particulars, to which Riley County Attorney William Kennedy objected.

"I don't think it takes a rocket scientist to figure out that there's a little tension with this matter between the District Attorney's office and the illustrious bar," Judge Jerry Mershon said.

After several minutes of debate about whether such a motion was appropriate, Mershon asked Pottruff to enter a plea for his client.

Social work students march for day care; request denied

Jennifer Taylor and Sarah Lunday
Collegian

K-State social work students marched through rain, wind and cold weather to get their point across Wednesday afternoon.

Twenty-five students gathered at the K-State Student Union free-speech zone, and 15 began marching toward the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex to raise awareness for the need of day care at the Rec Complex.

But after the march, the Rec Council decided not to take any action on the request of day-care supporters during a meeting Wednesday night.

"The council heard the concerns about the day care and basically took no action," Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said.

The Rec Council, which has 17 students and faculty serving on it, reaffirmed the last year's decision not to establish a day care at the Rec Complex, Robel said.

Chuck Allen, senior in elementary and secondary education and day-care supporter, said the council's basic philosophy was that people with children should take care of their own.

"The lack of compassion they showed was shocking," Allen said.

Allen and his wife have a 16-month-old child, which prohibits them from working out at the Rec Complex at the same time.

"It's tough. I'd love to work out with her," he said.

But one of them must stay home with the child, he said.

The amount of support for the day-care center at the Rec Complex during Wednesday's march was drizzled out by the rain, Jennifer Jackson, senior in social work, said.

"The weather hurt us, but not bad enough," Jackson said.

The group marched from the free-speech zone, around Anderson Hall, through the middle of campus and down Denison Avenue to the Rec Complex.

"There is a better way, the challenge is to find it," was chanted as they marched the streets.

The group carried signs with pictures of children, balloons and wore matching navy blue T-shirts with "Let's Play" on the front and "At The Rec" on the back.

► UNION DIRECTOR

Pitts says Union tradition is rich

Claudette Riley
staff writer

From his first campus union job on a custodial set-up/crew, Bernard Pitts has been training for his position as the K-State Student Union director.

"As an undergraduate, I became acquainted with the student union. First, it gave me a job and then later the leadership skills and experience, which empowered me to achieve," Pitts said.

"Basically, I feel that all my experiences have been block builders to move me toward this opportunity."

Pitts, who replaced Jack Sills as director Oct. 1, held leadership positions at seven other universities and has an academic background in student personnel administration.

"I was aware of K-State before coming here, but what I found was a commitment from the University to use the Union to provide for the needs of the student body. I also found a physical plant, which has been well-maintained," Pitts said. "I feel really good about the environment, and that makes all the difference."

His first job is assessing the resources and operations of the Union, Pitts said.

"The first challenge facing me is trying to catch up to speed, which is like trying to catch a speeding train. To be a contributor, I need to understand how the Union fits into the overall climate of the campus and community," Pitts said.

"The tradition here is rich in that it has served the students well over the past 40 years. I do see the opportunity to continue to move forward in terms of meeting the challenge of the changing demographics and needs of this campus."

As president-elect of the Association of College Unions-International, Pitts has observed more than 250 unions and their operations.

"A union, from my perspective, should be one that contributes to the campus educational and service mission and supports a quality campus climate through services, programs and leadership opportunities," Pitts said.

"I believe the Union is a place where everybody knows your name. Regardless of gender, race, religion or course of study, students can have their needs met here across the board."

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life and chair of the Union Director Selection Committee, said the committee was impressed with Pitts.

"We believe him to be a real leader in the field of union management. We found him to be progressive and experienced in union renovations," Scott said. "We were impressed that he focused so highly on students and their needs."

Meeting student needs will begin with looking into the delivery and presentation of the Union Food Service, Pitts said.

"Everyone has spoken very highly of our food service and quality. Quite frankly, the change being considered is a readjustment to reflect the make-

In the news

DEFEATED SEPARATISTS BLAME LOSS ON CANADIAN BIG BUSINESS

MONTREAL (AP) — Canada survived, just barely.

But Quebec emerged today from its independence referendum torn in half, with the defeated separatists targeting scapegoats and defiantly pledging another breakaway attempt.

The federalists who backed national unity squeaked through to win with 50.6 percent to 49.4.

By a margin of barely 50,000 votes out of 4.67 million cast Monday, Canada was spared the loss of its largest province, with one-quarter of its people.

But victory speeches calling for reconciliation coincided with street fighting between hundreds of youths from the rival camps, as well as a fire set at the office of a federalist leader.

The co-leader of the separatists, Quebec Premier Jacques Parizeau, shocked Canadians with a bitter speech blaming the defeat on big business and Quebec's non-francophone immigrants.

CONGRESS NOT CONVINCED U.S. TROOPS SHOULD BE SENT TO BOSNIA

WASHINGTON (AP) — On the eve of critical negotiations among the warring parties in Bosnia, the House is warning the Clinton administration that it hasn't made a strong enough case for committing U.S. troops to serve as the backbone of a NATO peacekeeping force.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich called the vote Monday night a sad vote and said it was a message telling the president, "You have not convinced us this is a good policy."

Speaking to the Nixon Center for Peace and Freedom an hour after the vote, Gingrich, R-Ga., said, "I don't think any of us should feel gleeful or partisan or happy about this."

On a roll call of 315 to 103 the House passed a nonbinding resolution declaring there should not be a presumption that enforcement of a peace agreement will involve deployment of U.S. armed forces on the ground in the territory of the Republic of Bosnia.

MEDICARE PROPOSAL COULD OFFER ELDERLY MORE HEALTH-CARE OPTIONS

WASHINGTON (AP) — The GOP overhaul of Medicare would let the elderly choose a new type of managed-care plan.

Their plan would be run by local doctors and hospitals instead of big insurers and health-maintenance organizations.

Physicians weary of battling with managed-care firms over patient care could find themselves in the driver's seat under the GOP remake of Medicare.

They would be allowed to form networks with other providers, bypassing insurers and HMOs, to compete directly for the business of the 37 million elderly or disabled Medicare beneficiaries.

Like other private health plans in the GOP's new Medicare

Plus arrangement, they would be paid flat annual rates set in advance to meet all the health-care needs for those who signed up.

No longer would they be paid for each service they ordered.

ECONOMISTS BELIEVE BALANCED BUDGET WILL CREATE BRIGHT FUTURE FOR U.S.

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States could have a bright future, with falling trade deficits, rising productivity and a higher standard of living, all thanks to a balanced budget, many economists believe.

They caution, however, that the long-term gains will not come without some near-term pain.

Economic growth will be marginally slower and unemployment slightly higher over the next seven years as the federal government trims nearly $1 trillion from its spending plans, they say.

Most analysts don't expect the deficit savings in the House — and Senate-passed budget bills to be enough to trigger a recession, as long as the Federal Reserve does its part by lowering interest rates.

"What we all expect to happen is for the Fed to respond to the deficit reductions by letting interest rates decline. That is the biggest factor that will cushion the cuts," Chris Varvares, economist at Laurence H. Meyer & Associates in St. Louis, said Monday.

Pep rally, Snyder's speech get students excited about Homecoming

James Dierking

The Union Courtyard sparked with dancing Classy Cats, singing men and football coach Bill Snyder Wednesday as more than 80 students geared up for Homecoming 1995.

"I'm very excited about Homecoming and think we'll blow out Oklahoma," Jennifer Brooks, sophomore in business administration, said.

The Union Program Council-sponsored pep rally, hosted by the 1994-95 K-State Ambassadors Casey Niemann and Jennifer Dunn, rallied the audience with performances by the K-State Pep Band, Classy Cats and Willie the Wildcat.

"I was really excited to catch a glimpse of the pep band and to hear Coach Snyder talk," Catherine Williams, senior in pre-physical therapy, said.

Snyder said the football program was eternally grateful for the support from the students, faculty, alumni and community.

"It's going to be a little cold, but I hope you are there," Snyder said, encouraging everybody to attend the Homecoming game.

Dirk Ochs, senior in kinesiology and defensive linebacker, and Tyson Schwiager, senior in social sciences and wide receiver, represented the K-State football team during the pep rally.

"These two truly have the best interest of K-State at heart," Snyder said.

When the stadium is full of purple, it makes the team play so much harder, Dirk Ochs, team captain, said.

Ochs thanked everybody for the support and cheers heard at the KU game.

"We'll try and do the same job as we did against KU," Ochs said.

Homecoming is a special time and is a tribute to fans," Schwiager said about the week events.

"Come, and wear your purple, and we'll work our butts off for you," Schwiager said.

Ruth Ann Wefald said everyone should attend the game and bring a can of food to donate for Cats for Cans, which is a student-organized committee to help raise food for underprivileged people.

"We must do something about this, and together we can," Wefald said.

Amy Bartel, chairperson of Cats for Cans and senior in architectural engineering, said the committee will be raising food until December.

"One out of five people are living at or below the poverty level," Bartel said.

Bartel said fans can donate a can or cash at the game.

During the pep rally, the K-State Men's Glee Club also performed a Big 8 victory song, complete with actions and noisemakers.

"I liked the glee club singing. They were really good," Emily Simpson, junior in music education, said.

► PURPLE MASQUE THEATRE

Students attend seance with the hope of seeing Nick the Ghost

J. Scot
staff reporter

A group of about 35 students gathered in the Purple Masque Theatre Tuesday night to hold a seance and contact Nick the Ghost.

Nick is believed to haunt the Purple Masque Theatre after his death in that section of East Stadium in the early 1900s. He died during a football game from a game injury, Charlotte MacFarland, assistant professor in theater, said.

After the football player's death, his parents died minutes later in a car accident on the way to watch him play in the same football game, MacFarland said.

"I heard there was going to be a seance in my fundamentals of acting class," Amy Martin, sophomore in art and theater, said.

The class was told in a subtle manner that the Purple Masque was going to be open on Halloween night, she said.

"I brought my two sisters along because they wanted to come and see Nick," she said.

Anne Martin, sophomore in theater and German, said she really did not know what to expect when she arrived at the Purple Masque.

"I expected people trying to see something," she said.

Amy Martin said she was just expecting people trying to contact Nick and that something might happen.

"Kind of a 50-50 thing of seeing something and contacting him," she said.

It turned into a social event, which was all right because it was Halloween, Anne Martin said.

Other students in attendance who had had personal experiences with Nick's ghost warned the newcomers of what to expect.

"I saw him last year during rehearsals for 'Empty Pages,'" Jennifer Collins, senior in anthropology and theater, said.

Three students walked up the stairs and saw a silhouette, which moved in front of them and walked through the door, she said.

"Then the door started moving, like someone had just walked through the door and it was swinging back and forth," she said.

"We all stood there in shock and amazement, and then I said, 'The door is moving. The door is moving,'" she said.

Another student in the group looked inside the door noticed something white in the room, she said.

"Then I repeated, 'The door is moving,'" Collins said.

They all looked at each other and ran down the stairs, she said.

Collins said a lot of other weird things have happened in the Purple Masque.

"Last week, we were in the dressing room, and the pipes were clanging. I said it was Nick, and Paul said 'No, it was the steam pipes,'" she said.

They argued about what was making the noise, and the noise got louder, she said.

"Paul then said 'OK, Nick, stop' and the noise stopped," she said.

Amy Mussman, senior in theater, said she believed there is something at the Purple Masque.

"Whether it is Nick — I am not sure," she said.

Mussman said she did not like the idea of people giving the ghost a human name.

"I do not think you can put a name on it because it is not a human, and giving it a name conjures up a human image," she said.

► COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE

Safety coordinator will allow faculty to focus on jobs

Dana Harding
staff reporter

The College of Agriculture plans to hire a safety compliance and training coordinator by Jan. 1.

The coordinator will help consolidate the various safety training and compliance programs within the College of Agriculture.

The consolidation should make the safety regulations stronger and increase protection for students and faculty, Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture, said.

The safety compliance and training coordinator will develop, implement and monitor safety policies and procedures for the college.

The college needs to deal with safety hazards before any accidents occur, Johnson said. Every day, faculty and students work with chemicals, operate equipment and handle animals, which poses the possibility of danger.

"Other universities who have not maintained good safety standards have suffered many law suits," Johnson said.

Each department now has its own safety regulations and training programs, but there are so many federal regulations regarding safety it is becoming more difficult to keep the departments in compliance with the law, Johnson said.

Fred Schwenk, department head of plant pathology, said a safety compliance and training coordinator would be responsible for transmitting the continuously changing federal regulations to the department and ensuring that the department complies with the law.

Jack Riley, department head in animal science and industry, said a safety program for the department would be focused on chemical use with animals.

"Safety comes into play with treatments used on animals. For example, parasite treatment involves the use of regulated products," he said.

A full-time safety coordinator will allow faculty members to focus on their jobs instead of keeping up to date on regulations.

"It is difficult for individual faculty members to be knowledgeable about all regulations. A safety compliance and training coordinator will be a valuable resource person to our staff and will allow the faculty to continue performing their job," Riley said.

Unselfish scheduling makes drop/add easier

Students make enrolling a much happier event than it is by properly using the drop/add system.

If you haven't heard, enrollment started Wednesday — meaning it is time to start planning your next semester's classes.

If you are reading this while in line to enroll, maybe you should stop and say "hi" to the person standing behind you and share the rest of this information with them.

Here is a helpful tip on making everyone's enrollment process the joyous occasion that it should be.

A popular notion is that if a student enrolls in more classes than he or she needs, or intends to stay enrolled in, then student can create a safety net of credit hours.

If the class turns out to be something other than what a student expects, or when the lucrative Pell Grant check is in hand, then the bothersome class in question can be conveniently disposed of when drop/add rolls around.

A catchy idea, but not the smartest one.

These actions create a hectic drop/add situation.

By enrolling in extra classes you might not even need, you are taking space from other students who are painstakingly trying to add a class you might not even attend.

The best thing to do is to plan ahead to get the classes you can and bite the bullet like the rest of the students on the campus and attempt to go through drop/add in spring.

Students make enrolling a much happier event than it is by properly using the drop/add system.

Crazy as this might seem, you will be helping the University by being responsible about your class selections.

Your fellow students will also appreciate the extra class space made available through wise scheduling.

Religious extremists need to ...
Lighten up

I have received many constructive responses in the past in the form of death threats, hate mail, spontaneously combusting mailboxes, etc. whenever I have addressed the sensitive topic of religion.

Therefore, I have asked the Surgeon General to issue the following: WARNING FROM THE SURGEON GENERAL — This column contains material which may be hazardous to your health. Despite your religious beliefs, do not try to eat, smoke, drink or otherwise ingest this column. Performing any of the aforementioned totally stupid rituals could cause severe damage to Sen. Bob Dole's presidential campaign.

The most important concern when discussing religion is the great diversity of religious beliefs. Any comment the sensitive writer might make takes the risk of offending the religious beliefs held by someone, somewhere. The result is that many sensitive, religious readers feel compelled to come after the sensitive writer with sensitive high explosives.

That is why (drumroll, please) I am going to be extremely sensitive to my readers' beliefs today while discussing the explosive topic of religion (largely because of the fact that I am concerned the concrete in this bunker from which I am writing is not sufficiently thick to withstand a suicide attack by Rush Limbaugh, let alone dynamite).

As an example of the enormous diversity of religious beliefs, let me offer the following scenario. Let's say you read somewhere there are people in Florida who believe pulling the heads off live chickens and drinking their warm blood, as a form of religious worship, brings them closer to God. Do you, the ever-sensitive religious person, say, "My, what a wonderful example of the great diversity of religious beliefs. Man has devised in his attempt to understand the wonders of the universe?" or, do you say, "These people have the total, accumulated intelligence of a bowl of spinach?"

In contrast, somewhere in Florida, a couple of chicken-chokers are sitting in their home watching a football game on television in which a player mumbles a short prayer and crosses himself before kicking a crucial field goal. "As if God gives a hoot about football," the chicken-chokers howl, wetting their pants with laughter while tears stream down their faces.

"By the way, is that your glass of warm chicken blood, or mine?" You see, that is the problem with religion: Everyone thinks their religious beliefs are the right beliefs, and everybody else's are pegging the wack-o-meter.

I could, as I have done in the past, inject my own sensitive, personal opinion at this point regarding the validity of either of the beliefs cited above (somewhere, the sound of dynamite being lighted), but I won't (sound of dynamite being snuffed out). I could also point out the absurdities in other religious beliefs, like Islam, or Judaism, Mormonism and Hinduism, just to name a few "isms" (again, the sound of dynamite being lighted), but I am not going to do that either (sound of dynamite being snuffed out).

No, I simply do not feel qualified to speak on these things. My background in religion is severely limited to the training I received 30 years ago in Sunday school. The main thing I recall is that, after everybody in the Bible did all their begetting, God went around smiting Pharisees, Jaycees, Emcees, BeeGees and anybody else that got in the way of the Israelites.

In fact, there wasn't a cubit that went by where someone didn't get the pomegranates smitten right out of them.

I remember asking my Sunday school teacher, who was an expert on smiting and other such biblical things, "Why does God always go around smiting everybody?"

"Well," she said, "that was the God of the Old Testament, and the God of the New Testament wouldn't smite a flea. The God of the New Testament is perfectly satisfied with shriveling trees that don't bear fruit, or tossing herds of swine off cliffs."

Note: By sharing with you the preceding conversation, it is not my intention to suggest that there is anything wrong with tree-shriveling or swine-herd tossing. As far as I am concerned, these are excellent things for God to do, and I wouldn't hesitate half a cubit to shrivel a few trees or toss a few squealing pigs if I were God.

If it weren't for Sunday school teachers, most of us wouldn't understand 1 percent of what is written in the Bible — which is why we now have TV evangelists to more conveniently explain it all to us in the comfort of our homes: "Now, after grabbing his ass and riding into GILGEMETH, it was SHABUM who had intimate carnal KNOWLEDGE with a herd of goats. It was NOT the goats who had intimate carnal KNOWLEDGE with SHABUM, but SHABUM who had intimate carnal KNOWLEDGE with the goats."

"Now, many of you ask, 'Brother Billy Joe Leroy Tom Ray Bob, what do you mean by intimate carnal KNOWLEDGE with goats?' Well, what I mean is, when we are talking about SHABUM, who literally GRABBED his ass and rode into GILGEMETH ... say hallelujah ... it was then SHABUM who had intimate carnal KNOWLEDGE with a herd of goats ..." — and so on and so on.

It can take several generations of begetting and equally as many "free" cassette tapes, along with your $100 faith donation, to even begin to understand any of this.

In conclusion, all I can say is, it is a wonderful world that we live in, full of many differing religious beliefs of all kinds.

And being the sensitive writer I am, let me also say we live in a great country where there are strict laws against assaulting columnists with sensitive high explosives just because you don't like what they write.

Instead of explosives, try tossing a few swine. I guarantee you will feel better in the morning.

Brad Seabourn is a graduate student in grain science and industry.

Viewing Christianity as a relationship

During the last few weeks, it has become clear to me that I have begun to place too much priority on things that don't really matter.

While budget battles rage in Congress, Bosnia peace accords are discussed in Ohio and the World Series is just wrapping up, I have turned my attention to the affairs of this world to the point of numbness when pictures of the casualties of Serbian shellings are shown on television.

I have been caught up in the budget battle in Congress, becoming angry when the media distort what is going on there or politicians worry about their next re-election rather than the effect of the legislation they are voting on.

I became focused on the World Series. I watched virtually every game from beginning to end, and although Cleveland didn't win this year, they'll be back.

And the list goes on.

From political movements to TV shows to distributing candy on certain nights of the year, a stream of activity is constantly displayed in front of our eyes.

And it all has one thing in common — it's temporary. TV shows come and go, political movements start and end every day and even candy will go stale.

I have discovered the necessity of living my life for something that will not lay me off, appear only in reruns or become stale.

As a good friend once said, "The Main Thing is to keep the Main Thing the Main Thing." Something this profound is rarely said this simply.

I have become disgusted with living my life for the moment, for the moment will fail me when I need it most.

I grow weary of political movements and social causes, for they only exist for the moment, and those who become followers of these groups will only come to find emptiness when their goal is achieved or the group disbands.

There must be something greater than these temporary items, for I will not plunge into the murkiness of the notion that life is meaningless, for this means I will end up living my life for the moment in the hopes I find temporary pleasure to relieve the suffering until I die.

JEREMY STEPHENS

Most agree there is a hell. I did not want to spend the time before and after I die in the same place. There is more to life than dying, and I intend to seize it.

Considering all these things, I was not interested in what the world had to offer — money, fame, or political gain.

So I was forced to turn elsewhere, placing what little hope I had in Jesus Christ. I have had the best time of my life ever since I did this, for my goal is not set on the things of this world.

It became clear to me that I would have to decide who Jesus is, for there is no doubt he was here, as both Roman records indicate this and time itself is split in half because of him. The question was — how would I respond?

For those of you who are sick of religion, let me say I am too. This is not a religion, but a relationship. It is based on faith, not church attendance. For those that are tired of being disappointed by those who label themselves "Christians," let me say actions speak louder than words.

There is no substitute for living for something that will not pass away. As Tim Robbins said in "The Shawshank Redemption," "Get busy living, or get busy dying."

I am convinced I am busy living by keeping the Main Thing the Main Thing.

Jeremy Stephens is a junior in marketing.

SENATE IMPEACHMENT

Editor,
What's the deal with Student Senate?

There are some members who want to impeach a senator for missing three "meetings," one of which was that stupid Student Senate retreat, right?

I could care less if Michael Henry and all the other senators were impeached, but am I wrong in thinking this is the same retreat there was all the commotion about because it used funds that were meant for one-time projects?

Hell, maybe all of the senators should have skipped the retreat and saved all of us some money.

What was so important about this retreat that a person couldn't be excused from it to go to work?

From what I can tell, this retreat was just a little get-together to show all the senators how to get along and be friends.

Now isn't that special?

Why don't the rest of you senators get a life and stop leeching off us students for your own benefit?

Why don't the rest of you senators get a life and stop leeching off us students for your own benefit?

CHRIS PRESTON

On top of all this, these senators have the nerve to claim that none of this is personal and that they are only following the rules.

Student Senate only follows the rules when it suits it.

Don't believe me? Some of you might remember about three semesters ago there was a vote to expand the K-State Student Union.

They said they needed something like 60 percent of the students to vote for it.

But that was before the vote came out about 15 votes too few. Student Senate took it upon itself to save us poor, misguided souls from our folly, did what was in our best interest and went ahead with the expansion plan.

Golly — and people wonder why there is so much voter apathy.

GOALPOST DOWNING

Editor,
Re: Dan Eshleman's "celebrating" Saturday's victory as pictured in Monday's Collegian and a quote of a Brian Graves is the subject of this letter.

Graves was quoted in a newspaper story to the effect that "this" (destroying a goalpost) was tradition; not demolition.

I urge Max Urlick and/or President Jon Wefald to ask these two to pay for the replacement of the destroyed post.

Knowing that more than just these two were involved, they (Eshleman and Graves) could lessen their liability by naming names of others and sharing the expense. Their graduation should be held up until full restitution is made. Otherwise, this stupidity will continue.

I resent my little contribution to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund going to pay for ignorance.

To those who stormed the field, the boos you may have heard were for you.

The cheers you may have heard later were for the team — certainly not for you, who are brain-impaired.

Your ignorance even outdid that of Fred Phelps and his congregation at the corner of Denison and Kimball avenues Saturday morning preceding the game.

Radio programs, biographies available via Net

Darin Siefkes
staff writer

Because radio has always been a versatile medium, it should be no surprise it has jumped onto the Internet. Today, we look at radio stations on the Net. These pages were previewed using Netscape 1.22 (<http://home.Netscape.com>)

KSDB-92 LEADS WAY

(<http://www.ksu.edu/~db92/main.html>)

The K-State radio station became the first station in Manhattan on the Web earlier this year and is still leading the way. KSDB-FM 91.9 has included a number of cool sections.

An easy-to-navigate program schedule is there to help explain what all of those damn specialty shows are about. Eric's Top 25 shows what the top songs being played by DB-92 are. (See if you can recognize any of the bands.)

They have even included pictures and biographies of the important people at the station, so listeners can finally put a face to the names they hear on the radio.

My favorite sections are the station tour, which will show a surfer everything they need to know about the station and then some. I also like the music archive section, which has a song by both Truck Stop Love and Scully (a.k.a. Spine, Puke Weasel, etc.) that is downloadable.

The big problem with this page is that it is slow because of the intense graphics and morphs it uses, but it is well worth the download time.

KMKF OFFERS ADDITIONS

(<http://codrus.mmedia.com/KROCK/html/home.html>)

KMKF-FM 101.5 has started a good page that is constantly being added to. K-Rock's page opens up with a small wave that users can download that welcomes the user.

Its concert calendar is OK. Most of the big shows in the area are highlighted. It also has links to Ticketmaster and Pollstar to help the concertgoer along.

The best part of this page is the links page. Raubin has compiled a great source for bands on the Net. Listeners can also e-mail requests directly to the studios. The page also provides links to K-Rock disc jockeys' home pages, and fans can e-mail some DJs.

The biggest problem with this page is some of the colors. (The links page is almost unreadable because it blends in with the background.)

KMAN JUST STARTING

(<http://codrus.mmedia.com/KMAN/>)

KMAN-AM 1350 has attempted to enter the Net, but it hasn't made the jump as well as K-Rock or DB-92. It's only feature worth mentioning is a link to MIT to give the weather forecast in Manhattan. This is not a page to dwell on much, and it's only included to point out that it is there and needs work.

HK — PLAY THAT TUNE

(<http://www.radiohk.com/radio/>)

Radio HK is dedicated to providing radio service to the Internet. You too can make your $2,000 computer do the same thing as a $10 transistor radio.

Sarcasm aside, sending a radio station signal through the Net is a good concept, and Radio HK is one of the best doing it. Radio HK provides a link to the Real Audio player that is required to listen in. It's an indie-rock format that sounds like bad AM radio.

What's really cool about this page is that surfers can pick what songs they want to hear and have the station play the songs. Talk about instant requests.

KJHK OFFERS STRAW POLL

(<http://www.cc.ukans.edu/~kjhknet/index.html>)

For all of you chicken hawk fans, I have included the University of Kansas student station, KJHK - FM 90.7. Besides broadcasting all the KU football and basketball games, the staff manages to run a good station with a fun home page. KJHK, like Radio HK, broadcasts on the Internet.

Pictures of the station's executive staff are included. The page has a heavy emphasis on sports, including links to the AP and CNN Coaches polls. Also included is KJHK's own straw poll. I don't find it too accurate, considering KU was ranked No. 4 in the country and K-State No. 25. Obviously KU fans have difficulty counting, because 41-7 has always seemed like a spanking to me.

Questions? Comments? New KU jokes? E-mail Darin at wings@ksuvm.ksu.edu

Parents oppose scheduling plan

Parents of area students attend board meeting in opposition of a proposed block-scheduling program.

James Dierking
staff writer

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education came under fire

Wednesday night for not communicating with the community concerning its block-scheduling proposal.

"We've tried to voice our concerns but have not gotten any answers," Joseph Knopp, Manhattan resident, said.

Almost 30 parents and residents were at the meeting in opposition to block scheduling of classes.

Block scheduling reduces the number of classes a student takes per semester, but increases the length of time a student spends in each class, and would especially benefit science classes that require labs.

Block scheduling was passed by the board in April, but a specific schedule is still being constructed.

Students are on a six-class schedule now. The proposed schedule would eventually affect all the district schools.

"This activity is counterproductive to our children's activity," Knopp said.

He said students would not be able to pay attention in classes that last 90 minutes.

Board member Larry Weaver also said more information was needed before a decision could be made.

"We need an explanation of a need for change in this direction," Weaver said.

Meryl Wilson, board member, said the issue was still under consideration and the parents had been heard.

"There has not been a schedule proposed yet," Wilson said. "This has been a two-year study with a committee made up of parents."

Knopp said almost 100 parents have joined together because of the issue, and another 200 to 300 have signed petitions against block scheduling.

In other discussion, a report on the school district's students' scores on aptitude tests was given. USD 383 students scored above average on Kansas assessment, American College and Scholastic Aptitude tests.

"In most areas, we are at or slightly above the state average," Nancy Thompson, USD 383 employee, said. "They're not terribly remarkable, but there's always room for improvement."

The board is next scheduled to meet in regular session at 7 p.m. Nov. 15 at the Robinson Education Center.

Legislature decides to keep fertilizer

Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state has no good reason to adopt new regulations on the type of fertilizer used to make the bomb that blew up the federal building in Oklahoma City, a legislative committee decided Wednesday.

The Special Committee on Agriculture and Livestock's members reached their conclusion after hearing conflicting testimony on whether ammonium nitrate fertilizer can be rendered useless for an explosive mix.

A retired engineer told committee members that a fellow engineer received a patent in 1968 for a process that makes the fertilizer less volatile. He said he raised the issue in the early 1970s in several states, but to no avail.

However, the leader of a fertilizer research center said other nations' efforts to render ammonium nitrate fertilizer less usable had failed. He said criminals have found ways to get around changes in the composition of fertilizer.

And lobbyists for chemical dealers and the Kansas Farm Bureau, the state's largest agricultural organization, asked committee members to be cautious about steps that could make the fertilizer more expensive.

The committee's chairwoman, Rep. Joann Flower, R-Oskaloosa, said committee members decided no action was warranted because how fertilizer is used is all in the hands of the user.

"We just decided it wasn't practical," she said of possible regulations. Legislative leaders had the committee study the issue at the request of House Minority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita. Sawyer had read a newspaper story about the retired engineer, Robert Colbert of Overland Park.

Prosecutors believe the two men accused of the April 19 Oklahoma City bombing, Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, purchased ammonium nitrate at a cooperative in McPherson.

Ammonium nitrate, mixed with fuel oil, is commonly used as an explosive by businesses such as quarries. A less volatile form, sold in pellets, rather than in powder form, is used as fertilizer. The fertilizer is used most often in eastern Kansas.

Colbert told the committee as an engineer for the Gulf Oil Corp. in Louisiana, he learned of another engineer's patent for a process involving ammonium nitrate. The process involved adding another fertilizer, diammonium phosphate.

Colbert left Gulf Oil in 1968 and became president of a company that wanted to alter ammonium nitrate. The company went out of business in 1972.

However, his testimony was disputed by the Fertilizer Institute in Washington, a national chemical industry group, and by Amit Roy, executive officer for the International Fertilizer Development Center in Muscle Shoals, Ala.

The center, a non-profit organization sponsored by the United Nations and the governments of several nations, including the United States, does research on fertilizer.

Roy said ammonium nitrate's volatility has been an issue for decades in Europe, where terrorism is more common.

He noted that the Irish government required fertilizer manufacturers to add limestone to make it less volatile. Terrorists grind the mix or filter it through warm water to make the ammonium nitrate usable as an explosive, he said.

"If there are people who are bent or determined to use it for criminal purposes, there is a way to do it," Roy said.

Some committee members noted that some bombs can be made using materials like flour and sugar.

"There's going to be any number of products that anybody with a criminal mind could use," said Sen. Stan Clark, R-Oakley.

"X-FILES" TO REPLACE TYSON

(AP) — Fox will replace Saturday's postponed Mike Tyson fight with reruns of the "X-Files" and local news. Fox Sports president David Hill declined comment on the bout, which was called off because of Tyson's broken right thumb. "It was trick or treat, and we got tricked," Hill was quoted as saying in Wednesday's editions of the New York Times. "All the marketing we've done, all the promos, you can't recall that," Hill said. "We were totally burned."

collegian Sports

FRIDAY

The Collegian will have a complete preview of Saturday's game against No. 25 Oklahoma.

Schwieger overcame obstacles to earn his place

The phrase, "No. 1 in team," is used a lot in college athletics, but as Kevin Lockett said, what fellow wideout Tyson Schwieger went through last off-season would ruin a lot of people.

A weaker player would crumble. A player whose dedication to the team was that of a Derrick Coleman would have probably sulked the entire season.

But Schwieger, unable to start this season because the Wildcats are using a two-back attack, hasn't been down. In fact, the native of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, considers himself lucky to be even playing this season.

After getting back from the Aloha Bowl debacle last season, Schwieger, coming off a 44-catch, seven-touchdown junior season, contracted rheumatic fever, which put his senior season in jeopardy. The already-light Schwieger lost 35 pounds ("The only time he was lighter than me," Lockett said) during the sickness, but returned to school in February taking independent study courses.

"It's an enlargement of the heart. And the infection, instead of your immune system fighting it off, it attacks your heart," Schwieger said. "It was a scary deal, so I appreciate every game I play. But I'm just glad we're having a successful season so far."

Schwieger sat out spring practice, which was tough for him because he stood on the sidelines while his best friends were on the field, he said.

"It makes you look at the whole thing in a different light, and I didn't realize how much I missed being out there practicing with the guys in spring drills and doing all of the winter conditioning," Schwieger said Tuesday. "I remember standing on the sidelines with Coach Snyder watching and just saying, 'Hey, I wish I could be out there with those guys,' and it just made me appreciate what I had."

"It was tough emotionally because I was disappointed. I didn't get a chance to be out there with my teammates, and I guess I was feeling a little sorry for myself. I was saying, 'Why me, why is this happening to me? I lost all this weight, and I'm behind in school.'"

Although it was tough for Schwieger to sit out, it was even tougher for his best friends on the team — former quarterback Chad May and fellow wideouts Lockett and Mitch Running — to see.

"It was tough for me to see Tyson sick because he's a good friend of mine, and seeing what he went through was difficult," Lockett said. "Mitch and I worked with him a lot. We got him back in the weight room, and I think he pretty much got back to where he was before he got sick."

May, now with the Minnesota Vikings, was a big help because he was struggling with the fact of being drafted in the later rounds of the draft.

"Chad helped me a lot through that time, and he was struggling through some tough times so we had a lot of talks," Schwieger said. "We'll always be close, even 20 years from now when our football careers are done. The thing I really missed most was the camaraderie."

Even though the happy-go-lucky Schwieger got down at times, he didn't give up as some people might have.

"For the most part, he was pretty positive," Lockett said. "He was down for a little bit, but his attitude changed when he realized this was his last year and it was something he would look back on for his entire life, and he realized a positive attitude was what he needed."

Once he found he would be able to play his senior year, Schwieger decided to take a different approach. Two weeks ago, he said he didn't enjoy his junior year, but it's the opposite this season.

"Last year, people would ask me how I thought I was playing, and maybe I was playing pretty decent, but I didn't want to give myself enough credit," Schwieger said. "And this year, with the sickness I had and maybe having my senior year in jeopardy and not being able to play it, once, once I got the opportunity in the summer, I just told myself I was going to make most of every game and play it like it was my last, and I've enjoyed it that much more."

"I didn't enjoy the Nebraska game, but other than that, it's been an exciting season."

And Schwieger, who was a preseason first-team all-Big 8 by five publications, has made the most of his final season, hauling in 31 catches and two touchdowns this season. Not being able to start during his senior year would destroy most players, but not Schwieger.

"It's not tough to take at all," he said. "Even last year, I started three or four games, so it's just a situation where I think Mitch and Kevin deserve to start, and in my opinion, they're better than me. It's not really a problem for me."

Wildcat Elliot Hatcher protects the ball from an Iowa State defender last year in Ames. Iowa State lost four starters and 10 letterwinners.

Iowa State is looking to replace four starters

Chris May
staff reporter

What can you say when your team loses four starters and 10 letterwinners?

"I wish old Freddy was back and Michalik was back and Meyer, Saun Jackson, Hamilton, Beechum, Jason Kimbrough. They all look pretty good to us right now," Iowa State basketball coach Tim Floyd said.

In only his second season with the Cyclones, Floyd is learning to rebuild a program. "I knew when I took this job that year two was going to be difficult," Floyd said.

He was right. The Cyclones are picked to finish eighth in the preseason Big 8 poll.

"It was hard losing Fred Hoiberg and Loren Meyer, and if I was voting, I would have picked us last because we only have five points returning and very little rebounding and minutes," junior guard transfer Dedric Willoughby said.

When Floyd arrived in Ames last year, he had all elements for an NCAA tournament team. Now, he's got nothing.

"Transition year, I think that's a nice word. Rebuilding, that's nice and kind. We're starting over. We've lost 95 percent of our scoring," Floyd said.

The Cyclones have eight new players on the team. Four are junior-college transfers, two are transfers from a four year college and two are out of high school.

"We're learning names right now in practice, more so than learning plays," Floyd said. "Once we get that down, we'll plug in the offense and mold it around what these guys can do."

The Cyclones are returning three letterwinners and one starter.

Junior guard Jacy Holloway is the returning starter, and he already knows his role on the team.

Holloway said he wanted to help the team out by scoring in the double figures, which is something he's been practicing on.

"I've worked hard this summer on my shot, and I've worked with Fred Hoiberg, so hopefully, it will pay off," Holloway said.

The expectations still exist for the Cyclones, Holloway said.

"For the media, there's no expectations, but for us, I think they're real high. No one on the team believes we're going to do bad," Holloway said.

Willoughby is a transfer from New Orleans and played for Floyd when they were both at New Orleans.

"Coach Floyd and I had a really good relationship at New Orleans, and he told me I could do a lot of good things here. So I followed him," Willoughby said.

Having played for Floyd before, Willoughby might be seen as a leader for the team, he said.

"In some of the players eyes, I'm in a leadership position because I've been with Coach Floyd for two years. When he wants to tell the team something, he'll probably go through me," Willoughby said.

Floyd is looking to the future with respect to his team.

"Our ultimate plan is to try to get nine or 10 guys that can play for Kansas or Missouri or Oklahoma State. Hopefully, we'll get three or four in this first year," Floyd said.

The Cyclones will begin action on Nov. 13, as they take on the Republic of Georgia Select in an exhibition game. They open the regular season Nov. 24 against Central Connecticut State.

The Wildcats will meet up with the Cyclones on Jan. 6 in Manhattan and Feb. 28 in Ames.

Harrington excited about Colorado's talent

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

It's an interesting situation for Colorado coach Joe Harrington this season.

"This team is the most talented team I've coached, which is exciting,"

Harrington said at Big 8 basketball media day Sunday in Kansas City.

But on the other hand...

"They are the most inexperienced team I've had, which is not so exciting," Harrington said.

For the first time in Harrington's six seasons in Boulder, expectations are high for the Buffaloes. Some preseason predictions have the Buffs finishing as high as third in the Big 8 behind Kansas and Missouri. Those hopes are fueled by the arrival of freshman point guard Chauncey Billups and transfer forward Martice Moore.

Billups, the most heralded recruit in Harrington's time at Colorado, was Colorado Player of the Year in 1992, '94 and '95. The 6-foot, 3-inch product of Denver averaged 23.8 points a game and shot 77.4 percent from the field in a four-year varsity career.

Although Billups will start at the point right away, it will take a period of adjustment for him to get acclimated to the Big 8 game.

"It'll be a new experience because the crowds and the type of people that cover him and come after him will take some adjusting," Harrington said.

The signing of Billups was a coup for Colorado, which is known more for its football program than its basketball squad. A McDonald's all-American last year and the fifth-best senior according to the Adidas Prep Report, Billups chose Colorado because it was close to home and he could step in and contribute right away.

"The fans will expect him to be superman, but he'll make some mistakes because he's 18 years old," Harrington said. "He'll make mistakes, and people will have to understand that. He'll profit from all of the mistakes he'll make, but they need to give him time to adjust and find his way."

Billups said he knew the spotlight was squarely on him.

And Harrington said Billups has already experienced being a hero in the state of Colorado.

"People stop me in the street and at the mall, but I expected it," Billups said. "It just comes with the territory."

But the Buffaloes won't win without the contributions of Moore, sophomore forward Ted Kritza and junior guard Mack Tuck, a member of the Collegian's All-Name Team.

Even though they lost Donnie Boyce (now with the Atlanta Hawks) to graduation, Kritza said scoring won't be a problem.

"I don't think scoring will be a concern," said Kritza, who averaged six points a game last year. "Rebounding is something that killed us last year — we got out rebounded night in and night out last year."

Colorado was last in the Big 8 in rebounding last season, but the addition of Moore should help the cause on the boards. Moore, 6 feet 8 inches, 234 pounds, transferred to Colorado after starting 47 games in two seasons at Georgia Tech. The Atlantic Coast Conference's rookie-of-the-year in 1993, Moore is a favorite for Big 8 newcomer of the year this season.

"You need to have a focal point or a marquee player on each team, and I think we have two of them in Chauncey and Martice," Kritza said. "There's a definite increase in talent, and before, we couldn't run with the horses because we didn't have enough of them in the stable."

With all of the new talent, the Buffs could get off to a slow start in the preseason.

"It could take awhile because of the inexperience, but its fun to watch practice because these guys can do more than any other team I've had," Harrington said.

The Buffs play host to K-State Jan. 13 and visit Manhattan Feb. 7.

Read the Collegian next Thursday for previews of Oklahoma and Missouri basketball.

► VOLLEYBALL

Wildcats fall in 3 games at Nebraska

Rich Pefley
staff reporter

The K-State volleyball team traveled to Lincoln Wednesday evening for a Big 8 Conference match-up with No. 1-ranked Nebraska.

It was a struggle for the Wildcats as they fell to the Cornhuskers in three games 15-4, 15-9 and 15-5.

As a team, the Cats hit -.099 for the match, with only 30 kills in 112 attempts and 31 attack errors. Senior Debbie Miller and junior Kate DeClerk were the only Cats to hit for a positive percentage, hitting .333 and .118 respectively.

Junior Kelli Luther led the Cats defensively with 13 digs. DeClerk added seven, and sophomore Devón Rynning added five to go along with her 23 assists.

The Huskers were clicking on all cylinders as they hit .289 as a team.

Allison Weston led the Husker attack with 16 kills in 36 attempts and only seven errors. Lisa Reitsma added 12 kills in 23 attempts and four errors.

Setter Christy Johnson was solid as she recorded 40 assists on the night to go with three kills, five digs and four block assists.

The Huskers continued their quest for a national title as they improved to 20-1 on the season and 10-0 in conference play.

Their one loss was on Aug. 26 to Stanford.

With the loss, the Cats fall to 0-53 all-time against the Huskers.

The Cats are now 16-8 on the season and 3-6 in conference play. The Cats are still battling Oklahoma and Colorado for a spot in the conference tournament.

Only the top four teams in the conference are invited to the post-season tournament in Omaha.

The Cats venture out of conference for their next match. They will hook up with the Golden Eagles of Oral Roberts University on Saturday at Ahearn Field House. The Golden Eagles finished the 1994 campaign with a 23-8 record. That includes a 3-0 win over the Cats. The match is scheduled to start at 7 p.m.

K-State Coach Jim Moore was unavailable for comment.

TSL to make local tour stop

contributing writer

Truck Stop Love will return to Manhattan tonight.

The band's tour bus will make a truck stop at Bombers. The tour is scheduled to last until December and will reach as far as Baltimore, New York City and Boston.

In other words, it might be your last chance to catch TSL for a while. The band is touring to promote its first full length release, "How I Spent My Summer Vacation," released last spring on Scotti Bros. Records.

The band is also recording for two compilation record projects.

TSL will showcase the band's new guitarist and vocalist tonight. Jim Crego, previously of the defunct

"We take it really seriously, but we certainly don't act serious."

WILLIE VADER
GUITARIST

Minneapolis sensation God's Favorite Band, will now front the band.

Opening for TSL will be Manhattan's Chick Scalietti and God Plow from Minnesota.

A composite of previous local bands, Chick Scalietti will be playing for the first time since the band's debut last June with Sufferbus and Dif, a Wisconsin band.

Although the band had hopes of recording at Red House Studios in Lawrence before the end of the year, after working together for about six months now, members aren't making any plans.

"Right now, we're just working on not sounding the same on every song," said Willie Vader, guitarist. "It's definitely serious, but we don't think we're going to be rock stars or anything. We take it really seriously, but we certainly don't act serious."

Chick Scalietti bassist Lincoln Lender prefers to keep his concentration on school with the band on the side, unlike the full-time commitment he used to make to Roach Factory before its breakup in spring 1994 after five years together.

"It can take so much time and effort if you want to make it,"

Lender said. "You just can't take off for three or four weeks at a time when you've got classes in the morning, but I got it out of my system."

"I don't have to worry about planning it. It works itself out," he said. "It's a great outlet now."

Despite criticism of the local live scene, Lender contends that Truck Stop Love is an example of how local musicians are doing more than they're given credit for.

"People wish more was going on with local music, but we need to encourage everybody to support it," Lender said. "They're a really great band, and people should know they've accomplished something to be proud of, something Manhattan should be proud of."

► ENGLISH

Immigrants want official language

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Immigrants from India, Chile and Hungary asked Congress to declare English the nation's official language Wednesday, saying it promoted unity, teamwork and respect for others.

Learning English was a small price to pay for the freedom and economic success they have enjoyed, they said.

"We did not come here so that we could maintain our native tongue or culture at government expense," said former professional football player Charles Gogolak, who fled Hungary with his family in 1956 after a revolution.

"This is not to say that we wished to forget our native tongue or heritage," said Gogolak, 50. "Indeed, I am very proud of where I come from."

The House Economic and Educational Opportunities' subcommittee on early childhood is considering four bills that would make English the country's official language. Each would require the government to conduct business and print forms only in English, with some exceptions.

Two would reduce or change bilingual education and the remaining one, written by Rep. John T. Doolittle, R-Calif., calls for a constitutional amendment.

The lone opponent during Wednesday's public hearing, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer, urged subcommittee members to reject the bills. They would violate the civil rights and liberties of Americans who don't speak English fluently, said Edward Chen of the ACLU's northern California chapter.

He said the bills would deny many people equal access to government and restrict government's ability to provide them services, Chen said.

"English-only laws are based on assumptions predicated on false and disparaging stereotypes about today's immigrants," he said. "Thus, they foster anti-immigrant bigotry and intolerance, and exacerbate ethnic tensions."

Others disagreed, saying English enriched their lives.

"Individuals who are not English-proficient are more often than not relegated to second-class citizenship, and vulnerable to being isolated by language barriers that render them dependent on the government for assistance," said architect Mauro Mujica, a Chilean immigrant and president of U.S. English, a 650,000-member group lobbying to make English the nation's official language.

"I strongly support keeping English as the only national language without a second thought," said Dr. Geeta Dalal, a Lafayette, La., physician who emigrated from India.

"All foreign immigrants are welcome to speak their native language, but they should be taught by their parents," she said. "Government should not have any obligation or any mandate to teach or to operate its business in any language but English."

Seven of the eight people invited to testify by the Republican-controlled subcommittee supported making English the country's official language.

Wednesday's hearing was the second held on the subject. At the first hearing last month, Education Secretary Richard Riley said it would be sheer folly to eliminate bilingual programs for children who don't speak English.

Dole bill would create more land for production

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., introduced legislation Wednesday to regulate programs for erosion control and wetlands conservation that would allow farmers to put more land into production.

The Resource Enhancement Act would make a series of changes in the Conservation Reserve Program, which idles land subject to erosion. It also would change agricultural rules governing wetlands and alter the way farm conservation rules are enforced.

"In my view, it is a remedy desperately needed to save farmers from a terminal case of over-regulation," Dole said.

A co-sponsor, Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Dick Lugar, R-Ind., said the bill would be good for the environment and protective of the property rights of farmers. The measure will become part of the 1995 farm bill.

Environmental groups contended the bill would shoot current conservation laws so full of holes it would essentially cripple the programs, most of which were first enacted in 1985.

"It guts either the integrity of the statute or the ability to enforce it," said Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group. "It would just be a tremendous setback."

Under the legislation, the programs would expire at the end of the 1995 farm bill in 2002 — the first time such a sunset provision has been attached.

Republicans in Congress want to cut farm subsidy spending by $13.4 billion over next seven years, continuing a trend Dole said has already begun. Dole said there is little point in continuing to tie dwindling farm program payments to compliance with so-called Swampbuster laws aimed at conserving wetlands.

"If we aim to fulfill the intent of conservation and wetlands laws, and we should, we must adjust to today's conditions," Dole said.

The proposed Swampbuster exemptions include parcels of one acre or less, drainage or irrigations ditches, artificial lakes or ponds used for agricultural purposes and land that was planted in crops at least six of the 10 years prior to the law's enactment in 1985.

Choirs present music from around the world

Portia Sisco

staff writer

International music will be heard at K-State tonight.

The KSU Choir and KSU Chorale will present their first concert this season, titled "Twentieth Century World Music," at 8 p.m. in All Faiths Chapel.

The choir and chorale will combine for a total of 108 voices and sing "Song of Exaltation" by American composer John Ness Beck.

Separate ensembles directed by Rod Walker, professor of music and director of choirs, will also perform pieces from Japan, Estonia, America, Venezuela, Sweden and Russia.

"The first concert of the year is always the most difficult to put together," Walker said. "Because of the new members and the new music, it has been a challenge."

Some of the ensemble pieces will include "Sohran Bushi," a recent arrangement of a Japanese folk song, and "Mata del Anima Sola," a Venezuelan song in which the choir imitates the sounds of a guitar.

William Wingfield, instructor of piano, will accompany the ensembles. Wingfield said many of the pieces are older songs that have been newly arranged within the last few decades.

Walker believes this is a different cultural approach to music.

"It's a very eclectic program," he said.

Walker said "The Magnificat," composed by Arvo Part, is the most challenging piece that will be sung at tonight's concert.

"It's quite advanced," said Walker.

"The Magnificat" was composed for a 36-member choir, and will be performed by a 62-member choir.

The choir and chorale have been selected to perform the same program in February at the Kansas Music Educators Association Convention in Wichita.

This will be the 10th year that the K-State music program has participated in the convention.

Taxis refuse black passengers

Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — A few blocks from the tomb of the Great Emancipator, a notice posted at Lincoln Yellow Cab Co.'s headquarters made it clear that even getting a taxi can be a question of race.

"Effective immediately: Do not pick up any black males unless you feel it is safe," the note read. "If you do not feel safe with the way they look Do not pick them up! There has been too many robberies lately, and they have all been by BLACK MALES."

The sign, posted on a bulletin board visible to customers, came down Wednesday shortly after an Associated Press reporter asked about it.

Manager Earl Reno said his lawyer advised him to take the sign down and put up a sign warning cab drivers not to pick up suspicious-looking people.

The issue of cab drivers being unwilling to pick up minorities has arisen before, most often in big cities. Last fall, former New York Mayor David Dinkins said a cabbie snubbed him.

Dinner at your place

Dinner parties for the college student usually include inviting a few friends to your house and ordering some pizza.

But there are ways you can class up the party.

Dinner parties need not be the expensive or time-consuming, involved process involving lavish dishes and extravagant decor.

Some things you need to consider if you are going to throw a dinner party are who you are planning to invite, how fancy you want the meal to be and what type of food you want to serve.

Gretchen Winter, owner of Encore Catering, said using things you can find at the store and then adding personal touches are helpful to student who don't have a lot of experience in the kitchen or a lot of time to cook.

"You really don't have to start from scratch anymore," she said. "You can use what's already on the market and add your own personal touch."

Basic foods are the best way to go, Winter said. If you get exotic, you are taking the chance of choosing foods some of your guests haven't ever tried and may not like.

"If you want to make them fancy, make them look fancier," she said.

Winter said some good hors d'oeuvres to serve are chicken wings or meatballs.

"You can buy the chicken wings already packaged in the store, or you can buy chicken thighs and cut them in half," she said.

Bake the wings in the oven at about 350 degrees for about half an hour.

Winter said after the wings are cooked, you should lay out several sauces, like honey mustard and barbecue, to dip the wings in.

"Meatballs are also something you can already buy frozen," she said.

Cook the meatballs in a ketchupbased sauce with salsa or brown sugar, depending on whether you and your guests prefer the sauce to be spicy or sweet.

Serve the meatballs on toothpicks to your guests.

Winter said fruits, vegetables and cheese sticks are also simple things you can serve as appetizers.

For the main course, Winter said there are some easy and likable entrees that are easy to make.

One such suggestion is a boneless ham baked with a marinade of hot-spicy mustard and honey. The ham should be baked uncovered at 350 degrees for about 45 minutes. Drip the sauce on the ham and serve.

Chicken is another popular dish, but sometimes it can be a little dull. Creative in preparation is key.

Winter said to use chicken pieces that are already cut.

"If you've never cut up a chicken into pieces, it can be very difficult," she said.

Prepare a mixture of cracker crumbs and some other kinds of seasonings, such as garlic powder or Parmesan cheese, depending on your tastes and the tastes of your guests.

Dip the chicken in milk and roll it in the cracker-crumbs mixture. Place it in a non-stick pan, drizzle some melted butter on it, and bake at 350 degrees for 45 minutes.

As a side dish for your main course, Winter said something prepackaged is easy and tastes good.

"I would as an accompaniment, to use rice or potatoes. They are wonderful," Winter said.

Another popular side is French-style green beans. Add bacon or a cream of mushroom soup for some originality.

"Green beans are always a fairly universally liked vegetable," Winter said.

Dessert should not be overlooked. Nor should you stress about baking your own cake or coming up with something creative.

Winter said a boxed cake with a personal touch would be fine.

"It's pretty tough to beat boxed cakes when you're not used to making cakes from scratch," she said.

One interesting and fun way to spruce up the cake is to run a fork over the top and make a checkerboard design with the prongs.

Something else you can do is take raspberries, mix them with sugar and sprinkle them over the top of the cake. You can also put the raspberries on the plate and put the cake on top.

Sherbet and ice cream served with fruit is another delicious dessert idea.

Who you should invite is something else you need to decide.

According to an article in this month's Cosmopolitan magazine, six people, including yourself, is the perfect number.

You should invite your guests about 10 days before the actual event. That gives them time to clear their calendars. Either a phone call or some informal note are fine to use as invitations.

And it's not important that you have the same number of women and men present. Nor do you need to make sure everyone invited is pre-acquainted with each other, but rather that your guests are compatible.

"Cultivating a roomful of warm chemistry, after all, is half the fun of entertaining," the article said.

Smatterings

by Scott Allen Miller

Maybe it's because they do it birdie-style

University of Kentucky ornithologists have recently discovered why it is that when birds have affairs, they are more likely to produce offspring than when birds mate with their life partners. The research has shown that the sperm of male zebra finches travels faster when inseminated in females other than their normal mates. If this research were done on humans, it might explain why rednecks on Sally Jessie Raphael's talk show seem to be able to breed better when they sleep with their spouse's parents and cousins.

News from the city of brotherly skid marks

It was a simple job, but somebody didn't do it. Philadelphia City Controller Jonathan A. Saidel has fired the employee in charge of stocking Veteran's Stadium with toilet paper. Saidel alleged the employee bought $34,000 worth of the personal tissue with city funds and sold it before a Philadelphia Eagles game.

"We don't really know how long this was going on," a spokesperson for the city said. "But man, he really wiped that stadium clean."

Programs were undoubtedly selling at premium prices at that game.

Fred Phelps's new sign: God hates transvestites, too

On Halloween night, a group of K-State, University of Kansas, Washburn University and Benedictine College students led by Greg Doring, sophomore undecided at K-State, went trick-or-treating at the Fred Phelps family enclave in Topeka. The group of men were dressed in drag and struck what Doring called provocative poses after knocking on the doors. The first person they visited was hesitant to respond but eventually answered the door, Doring said.

"She said 'We don't worship Satan. Good night,'" Doring said. "She didn't give us candy or anything. It kinda bummed us out."

Doring and friends, who seemed full of alcohol and frontier spirit on the audio tape he gave the Collegian, might go down as the first people in drag to venture into the Phelps compound. Will they be the last? Don't bet on it.

Sober up, eh?

Norman Newmarch of Toronto decided to drive to the police department to take a test to find out whether he was sober enough to drive. He found out. Newmarch allegedly crashed into a parked police cruiser while trying to park and was charged with driving under the influence of alcohol. Maybe he ought to shoot somebody to find out whether his gun is loaded.

Simon play offers look at 1950s TV

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

If you don't follow contemporary theater — and who can blame you — a safe bet for a lot of laughs is a Neil Simon play.

You're in luck tonight as McCain Auditorium presents Simon's "Laughter on the 23rd Floor."

"Laughter" is Simon's semi-autobiographical account of his days as a junior writer for Sid Caesar's "Your Show of Shows" in the 1950s. It was there Simon worked with some of the greatest comic writers of the TV era, rubbing elbows with the likes of Mel Brooks and Carl Reiner.

Perhaps Reiner beat Simon to the punch on this topic with his own standard-setting sitcom, "The Dick Van Dyke Show." Anyway, Simon is having his say on the issue, and he is having his fun.

"Laughter on the 23rd Floor" is funny. It's that safe, pre-1968, universal kind of funny where you don't have to be an insider or alienated from the system to get the jokes.

Simon doesn't try to confuse his audiences with groundbreaking subject matter or situations. His shows aren't necessarily confrontational. Who could have walked out of "Plaza Suite" feeling mad at the world?

However, Simon has a track record one can't argue with: "The Odd Couple," "The Goodbye Girl" screenplay, his highly popular, autobiographical "Brighton Beach" trilogy and his recent Pulitzer Prize-winning "Lost in Yonkers," which made a tour stop in McCain last year.

Yonkers was a pretty serious play for Simon, but even it packed in quite a few knee-slapping laughs.

"Laughter," was Simon's 29th production on Broadway, and getting a play produced on Broadway at all is no small feat, even for Neil Simon.

The original production scheduled to hit the boards of McCain tonight was to star Gabe Kaplan of "Welcome Back, Kotter" fame. He has resigned because of illness.

So, taking over for Kaplan is Ernie Sabella, who plays Milt, one of many writers housed on the 23rd floor writing for "The Max Prince Show." The Prince show was a popular variety show broadcast live for 90 minutes every Saturday night in 1953.

Sabella, or his voice at least, will be familiar to fans of the Disney animated feature "The Lion King" as that of Pumbaa, the warthog.

Ron Orbach stars as Max Prince. Orbach appeared in the Broadway version of "Laughter," as well as starring as Prince in the Chicago production. Orbach most recently appeared in the teen movie "Clueless," but don't hold that against him.

This show is a tour production by the National Company, which reassembled the original Broadway production team of "Laughter." Broadway veteran Jerry Zak's original direction has been restaged by Lewis J. Stadlen, who created the role of Milt in the original Broadway production.

► 'MUSIC MAN'

Choreography matches drama

■ Movement enhances actors' emotion and dialogue story by Jeni Pruitt

They call it "the dungeon." It's not exactly the kind of place you'd want to be on Halloween night.

They'd probably rather not be there, either.

But with only three weeks before the opening night of "The Music Man," the cast of the musical had no choice.

For weeks, they have been rehearsing the musical for three hours Sunday through Thursday, and next week, the rehearsals will be daily.

While the designers take care of the technical aspects of the production, cast members put aside their studies for the next three hours to drain their last bit of energy into the production.

"Now we're getting to the point where we've got to run it and run it," said Travis Malone, graduate student in theater and the lead in "The Music Man," said. "This is where it starts to take shape — finally."

On top of the perfection that must be achieved, the choreography can't look planned.

"It looks spontaneous, but it never is — that's the hard part," Luke Kahlich, director and choreographer, said.

grapher, said.

When Kahlich began choreographing the movement in "The Music Man," he had to keep in mind what was happening dramatically in each scene so that the movement would look natural and unplanned.

"There wasn't a specific image for my choreography," he said. "The choreography is a part of the bigger picture that I started in February when we chose the show."

When I put dancing in a particular spot, it's not like I said, 'OK, let's stop and dance for a while.' The dance must flow naturally."

At the end of the library scene, the actors are on top of the desks dancing and lifting their partners in the air, but Kahlich said that he had to choreograph the dancing to progress slowly and naturally.

ly so it would look realistic. "What do you think of when there's a library?" Kahlich said. "You naturally think of books and people that want you to be quiet. So, I started with a tone that everyone expects in a library and then gradually broke this tone. In the end, we'll have everyone dancing off the tables."

Kahlich said that the movement part of the production is important because it makes the actors' lines more believable.

"I think that's the truer part of expression of human beings," he said.

"You know if someone is lying by the way their body moves in relation to what they're saying. I find that even if actors know what to say and are trained how to say it, they're very untrained in how to conduct their bodies," Kahlich said.

Because the musical is dependent upon movement, each rehearsal begins with an extensive warmup.

Kahlich gives two short claps as the dancers cut their conversations short, throw on their dance shoes and scramble to their places.

Red, blue, yellow and orange pieces of tape on the floor serve as reminders of where the scenery will be, two chairs propped together form a piano for one of the actors and the dancers dodge poles as they work through their routines.

Because of the low ceilings, the dancers will not be able to lift their partners until the week of the production, when they will move upstairs to the actual stage.

Kahlich said that he would wait until the last week to put the jumps into the choreography as well.

"We have to be very careful with the floor because it's cement," he said.

"We can't do a lot of jumps, or we'll get stress factors in our feet or shin splints," Kahlich said.

Kahlich said that when they moved onto the stage in two weeks, it would be a big shock.

Despite the tension that increases as the opening night nears, the rehearsal room is surprisingly calm.

"Does anybody know why I stopped you?" Kahlich asked, interrupting a dance sequence.

"Because we didn't have enough energy," a dancer answered.

"That's right," Kahlich said. "You just said, 'OK, we're going to sing and dance now.' That's not exciting to the audience."

Regardless of how late the rehearsal is running, Kahlich expects to see energy, which for many of the dancers, means they need to be in good shape physically.

"I try to stay in somewhat a resemblance of shape — not too good, but just enough that I can run up the stairs without dying," Malone said.

"This is especially important for someone like me. I'm constantly on stage, and I've got to keep up my energy."

However, if the dancers weren't in shape before they began the musical, they will be by opening night, Jeff Hershberger, senior in biology and theater, said.

"We're probably in better shape than the football players are," Bill Mahan, sophomore in theater, said with a grin.

KYLE WYATT/Collegian

News Digest

► DOUBLE AGENTS TAINTED SOVIET REPORTS

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is reviewing billions of dollars in arms purchases that may have been based on bogus estimates of Soviet strength that were fed to the government by double agents, a senior defense official said Wednesday.

The review encompasses a range of weapons, from missile warheads to nuclear submarines to high-performance fighter aircraft purchased late in the Cold War.

Deputy Defense Secretary John White, the Pentagon's No. 2 official, has established a panel of experts to examine the fallout from a CIA report acknowledging that intelligence officials passed along tainted information from Soviet-controlled double agents.

"One objective of the study will be to review the weight that was given to what we now know was 'directed' information in assessments that influenced policy decisions," the defense official said.

Pentagon officials learned earlier this year that the double agents, apparently under the orchestration of convicted CIA spy Aldrich Ames, provided the CIA with exaggerated reports of Soviet military capabilities.

CIA analysts then passed those reports on to decision-makers at the White House and in the Pentagon without any warning that the information may have been bogus.

"We've been working with other members of the national security community to assess the damage this 'controlled' information might have caused," said the defense official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity.

PITTS

up of the student body and the type of food they consume," Pitts said.

Pitts is considering the addition of Mexican food, hamburger, pizza and sandwich groups to Union space.

"One of the key things we need to decide fairly quickly is the configuration of what our food service will look like.

"We still don't know if we will be self-operation or contracted out or some hybrid of the two," Pitts said.

The timeline for the Union-enhancement project also calls for an upgrade of life safety and Americans with Disabilities Act codes, which will include some cosmetic changes.

"I think we will see some new square footage, but we're dealing mostly with cold issues, like updating building life-safety codes, fire codes and ADA codes," Pitts said.

"If we stay on our timeline, we should go out for contracting bids by November 1996."

Pitts, who was halfway through a doctoral program in professional studies during his time as associate director of Memorial Union at Iowa State University, said he hopes to get settled and make the time to finish.

An avid golfer, Pitts said he has made little time for anything besides work since moving to Manhattan.

Pitts said his wife, Candice, an elementary school teacher, and his son, Myles, age 12, will join him as soon as their home in Ames, Iowa, sells.

"Your family is basically your power source, and my power source isn't here yet. That's what makes the transition difficult," Pitts said.

"I understand, though, that it's really critical that I become intuned with the Union as quickly as possible. The day I started, I just started running."

ROBBERY

she and her friends ordered pizza later Tuesday evening.

She was missing $20 from her purse. Her credit cards and checkbook were still in her purse.

"It wasn't until later when I realized my money was missing," she said. "It's the most cash I've carried in a long time."

Her friends then urged her to call the police because she had been robbed, she said.

"I feel pretty lucky," she said. "I owe so much to my friends. If it wasn't for them, I wouldn't have gone to Lafene."

She said she was never going to walk alone on campus again, at night or during the day.

"Get an escort if you need to," she said. "It's just not something you think about during the day."

Even though this happened, she said she still thought K-State was one of the safest campuses.

"She said while walking through the parking lot, she saw no one," Amaro said. "It really shook her up."

Amaro said it was likely that the assailant was hiding behind a car and waited until she walked by to jump out and hit her over the head.

Officers are hoping she will remember something in the next few days that might help with the investigation, he said.

Amaro said he would encourage students who park in lots B-2 or B-3 to walk in pairs and know their environment. Students may also call the Wildcat Walk Escort Service in the evenings.

"Look around," Amaro said. "See if anyone is standing off by themselves or if anyone is walking through the parking lot."

It's also important for students to keep their eyes open and to be aware of the three emergency phones in the lots, especially at night.

"I've always thought it was safe during the day," Amaro said.

In the meantime, the campus police are investigating the incident. Robbery is a felony, Amaro said.

COURT

"We would have to remain mute," Pottroff said.

"Then the court will enter a plea of not guilty," Mershon said.

Mershon will hear oral argument about the bill of particulars Thursday, Nov. 16, at 1:15 p.m.

After the proceedings concluded, Pottroff said the police reports contained no evidence of criminal behavior by his client.

"Suffice it to say that in 15-20 years, I've never gone through police reports and had to try and figure out what my client did wrong," Pottroff said.

"Frankly, I don't think anybody can go through those police reports and find anything Brian Kavanagh did wrong."

Pottroff said he feared the media have had a negative effect on the perception of his client and he hopes this case will be treated like any other.

"I don't want to try the case in the press. But the tragedy of this incident so far is that at least two of these, if not all three of them, have already been tried in the press," Pottroff said.

"I would like these guys to be treated like anybody else, but that's not going to happen. I would pray that they would get the same presumption of innocence as anybody else, but that hasn't happened."

Pottroff also questioned the timing of the charges and indicated one of the defendants might not have even been present at the time of the incident.

"I don't know the motivations. I don't know the motivations for naming three football players just before the KU game. I don't understand how it got this far," Pottroff said.

"There's a bigger tragedy because I know another one of the defendants wasn't even there. That's maybe the worst tragedy there is that somebody can not be present or have participated in anything."

Pottroff concluded his comments by stating the allegations against his client were as yet unproven.

"Allegations are exactly that — allegations. It happened in Salem with witches, it happened with the '60s with communists.

"Allegations are allegations. At this point, what we've got is a series of allegations. And if you start reading the facts of the case yourself, you'll find these allegations may or may not be well-founded."

Ahearn Field House brimmed with enthusiasm, as fraternities, sororities and residence halls performed body building routines Thursday night.

Each group was given five minutes to show the judges why their routine of dancing, clapping and formations deserved a place in the finals.

"It's a lot of hard work," said Aaron Cordell, junior in agricultural business and member of Alpha Tau Omega. "We've been practicing at least three times a week for two hours a day."

The K-State cheerleaders roused the crowd with a performance that brought a roar.

"We do it every year," Chris Coad, sophomore in advertising, said. "It gets the crowd hyped and lets them know that we support them and the football team."

After the actual competition began, some people began to feel the pressure to succeed for their houses.

"I'm a little nervous," said Melissa Lamer, freshman in pre-pharmacy and member of Kappa Alpha Theta. "There's a lot more people here than I expected."

Many teams were excited to finally have the chance to perform in front of a group and show what they were capable of.

"It's such an adrenalin rush," said Julia Jantz, sophomore in interior design and member of Alpha Chi Omega.

The routine was awesome with everybody watching and cheering, Jantz said.

"We worked hard and the routine came out sweet," said Chuck Fehr, senior in advertising and member of Kappa Sigma.

Most performers agreed the hard work and time involved was worth it in the end.

"We've worked hard for over a month, but it was worth it," said Andy Beckman, freshman in business and member of Tau Kappa Epsilon. "We feel we have a good routine if everything goes right."

Once the competition was through, the judges deliberated and announced the winners to the waiting crowd.

After each group was announced the houses erupted in celebration.

"It was awesome," Nancy Grubb,

KSU Stadium to get television

KSU Stadium will be installing two new TV screens in the southwest and southeast corners of the stadium and improving the existing scoreboard. The improvements are expected to cost $700,000.

Big-screen TVs hit KSU Stadium

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

At the dawn of the Big 12 conference, KSU Stadium will have the technology to show 42,000 fans instant replay and more.

Three new message centers, costing about $700,000 total, are scheduled to begin construction at the beginning of summer.

The project will be paid for by selling advertisement space alongside the new message centers, and selling sponsorships to commercials and animations that will play on the new screens, Matt McMillen, associate director of Intercollegiate Athletics, said.

"We anticipate the new boards to bring in enough revenue to not only pay for the new message centers, but to finance improvements to the stadium," he said.

Two high-resolution screens will be placed in the southeast and southwest corners of the stadium.

"We're putting in two high-resolution boards, which are capable of commercials, live video, crowd shots and instant replay," McMillen said.

The screens will have information boards, including game clocks, statistics, other college football game scores and advertisements.

"Not only are the new boards better for the fans, they will be more functional for the players and coaches," McMillen said. "These will give us a game clock on the south end. We don't have that right now."

The third information center will be a new scoreboard on the north end of the field.

"We'll be totally revamping the north-end scoreboard," Max Urlick, director of Intercollegiate Athletics, said.

McMillen said the new scoreboard will provide the same information, but with an added screen for animated pictures.

The company constructing the screens is Fairtron from Des Moines, Iowa. Fairtron has built scoreboards and message centers in college stadiums across the country.

Fairtron has worked with four other Big 12 schools, including the University of Texas, Texas A&M, Baylor University and the University of Missouri.

Advertising money raised by the screens will finance improvements and expansions to bathrooms and concessions within the stadium.

"We really need to improve the situation with our concessions and women's bathrooms," McMillen said. "Right now, people have to wait forever just to get a drink, and there's always a line outside of women's bathrooms."

McMillen said the Athletic Department already has commitments from corporate sponsors to purchase space on the new boards.

Advertising packages could come in one, three, or five year options. Costs could range from $20,000 to more than $100,000.

In addition to the message centers

Fitzwater promotes book at Varney's

Fitzwater

Marlin Fitzwater, former White House press secretary for presidents Ronald Reagan and George Bush, will be signing his new book, "Call the Briefing," from 2 to 4 p.m. today at Varney's Book Store.

In the book, Fitzwater wrote about his career and his school days at K-State.

Fitzwater graduated from K-State with a bachelor's degree in journalism in 1965.

During his college years, Fitzwater worked at four journalism-related jobs. He was a business manager and staff writer for the Collegian his sophomore year. He was also an advertising representative for the Manhattan Mercury and a stinger for the Topeka Capital-Journal.

As a White House press secretary, Fitzwater represented the White House and prepared thousands of statements for the presidents he worked for.

Campus EventLine to inform students

Jonathan A. Yeomans
staff reporter

A one-stop, 24-hour information phone line for campus events will be up and running Monday.

Campus EventLine, which is sponsored by the Union Activities Board, is an automated, menu-driven voice mail system students can call to a recorded message offering different categories at the push of a button.

The phone line idea was conceived from movie theater information lines, said Robert Wilson, UAB chairperson and graduate student in regional and community planning.

"There is no single resource on campus that tracks what events are going on," Wilson said. "We get quite a few calls every week from people wanting information that we cannot give them."

The five categories will include Union Program Council sponsored events, multicultural events, fine arts performances, special events and general presentations.

Lisa Heath, UAB adviser, said campus groups need to give UAB information for announcements of upcoming events for the phone line.

Also, students need to know they can call anytime to get that information.

Students will have the opportunity to hear from as many categories as they want.

Some of the categories overlap, but the announcements do not, Wilson said.

"For example, there might be an announcement about an art show in the multicultural events category," he said.

UAB sent out an announcement request form to all groups on campus that might be interest-

Clothing drive under way

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

Two on-campus organizations are collecting clothes to help K-State's international families combat the Kansas cold.

Rotaract and Helping International Students are sponsoring a winter clothes drive to ensure international families of K-State and needy people in the Manhattan area have warm clothing this winter.

For many international students, there is a need for winter clothing because they came to Kansas from warmer climates, Carolyn Schaeffer, president of Rotaract, said.

"The majority of students I'm around are from India and South Africa, were it can be 110 degrees," she said. "A majority of them have to come with limited things on the plane, and winter clothing isn't always their top priority."

Collection boxes have been set up in the lobbies of Justin, West and Moore halls to accommodate donations.

"We are looking for winter clothes, boots, gloves, outer clothing and sweaters," said Zandra Thompson, associate coordinator of HIS. "We need adult and children sizes."

The deadline for donations is tentatively set for Saturday, but will be extended if necessary, Thompson said.

"We don't want to drag this out too far into winter," she said. "We want to distribute these things before it gets too cold."

Thompson said the group will pick up any donations at the person's home if they are unable to deliver the clothes to the collection boxes.

Rotaract and HIS will sponsor a sale of the collected clothing on Nov. 11 for international students at very cheap prices, said Mahesh Narasimhan, community service chair for Rotaract.

"Prices will be much, much cheaper

CEREMONY TO COMMEMORATE ALCOHOL-RELATED TRAFFIC DEATHS

The lives of 36 Kansans who died in alcohol-related traffic accidents last year will be remembered during a ceremony at Saturday's Homecoming football game against Oklahoma.

Fans attending the game will be asked to observe 36 seconds of silence during the ceremony for the 36 college-aged people.

"If you've ever seen it, it is very powerful to have 45,000 people totally quiet in a huge stadium for the remembrance of those killed in an alcohol-related accident," said Jelena Jovanovic, assistant director of alcohol and other drug education service.

Coach Bill Snyder will give a pre-recorded public service announcement before the Oklahoma game.

"It'll be played during pre-game after the National Anthem, and a band member will play Taps for 36 seconds after his message is over," Jovanovic said.

The ceremony is sponsored by the K-State Athletic Department, K-State Marching Band, Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students and Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol.

This will be the fourth year for the ceremony.

DEMOCRATS VOICE CONCERNS

WASHINGTON (AP) — At a recent closed-door meeting with House Democrats, Leon Panetta was peppered with occasionally hostile comments and questions from lawmakers concerned about President Clinton's intentions this fall.

A bad deal is worse than no deal on budget negotiations expected soon with Speaker Newt Gingrich and the Republicans, the president's chief of staff said, according to several Democrats who attended.

Despite Panetta's reassurances, Wednesday's caucus underscores the nervousness in Democratic ranks that Clinton, with his own re-election campaign in mind, will abandon the party's longstanding support for social programs and make a separate budget peace with Republicans. In the process, Democrats fear, he could undercut their politically potent claim that Republicans want to cut Medicare to finance tax cuts for the rich — an important part of their strategy for regaining control of the House next year.

"We know what triangulation means," Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., said of Clinton's much-discussed strategy.

It means he's running his own campaign independent of Republicans and Democrats, Slaughter said.

"Where the president remains to be determined," said Rep. John Bryant of Texas, one of those who spoke up at the party caucus.

Democrats have been cheered in recent weeks by polls that chart a decline in support for the GOP balanced budget plan that clamps down hard on spending on Medicare, Medicaid, and other social programs.

A Wall Street Journal-NBC News poll published Thursday reports 61 percent of those questioned favored a veto of the GOP budget. Only 32 percent hoped Clinton will sign it.

FLORIDA SCHOOL BUS HIJACKED

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. (AP) — For 75 terrifying minutes Thursday, an edgy man with a small bag stood on a school bus with 13 disabled children aboard, repeatedly reaching into his jacket as if he had a gun and threatening to blow everyone up.

Four times, the bus, surrounded by police cars as it traveled 15 miles of Miami-area highways, came to a stop at the hijacker's request.

Each time, he crouched down and gathered his whimpering young hostages around him to shield himself from the police.

When negotiations failed, police shot him to death at the door of the bus and dragged him into an alley.

When it was over, the crying children were taken into the crab restaurant where the hijacker was a waiter and were given Cokes, french fries and ice cream.

The hijacker was identified as Catalino "Nick" Sang, 42, a native of the Dominican Republic who had lived legally in the United States since 1984.

BABY COUGAR BITES GINGRICH

WASHINGTON (AP) — House Speaker Newt Gingrich, an animal lover, was nuzzling a baby cougar Wednesday when it bit him on the chin.

A minor abrasion, it drew just a spot of blood.

"He gets bit every day, doesn't he?" joked Columbus (Ohio) Zoo director emeritus Jack Hanna in reference to the rough and tumble of Washington politics.

Hanna, a frequent visitor of Gingrich, R-Ga., had the mountain lion and other animals in the office of House Budget Committee Chairman John Kasich, R-Ohio, whose district includes Columbus.

It was Kasich's idea to take the animals to a closed meeting on the budget.

Sounds of the Modern World

K-State singers tackle underappreciated modern music

Twentieth century music is often overlooked by audience members and concert programmers alike in favor of music not much older than the turn of this century.

Scott Allen Miller
staff writer

All Faiths Chapel, an example of contemporary architecture, was filled with the sounds of contemporary choral music Thursday night.

The chapel was a fitting setting for the K-State Choir and K-State Chorale to perform a concert titled "Twentieth Century World Music."

Rod Walker, professor of music and director of choral activities, conducted both groups.

Walker said this concert was the groups' first attempt to stretch enough to do this kind of music so early in the season.

There was plenty reason to be thankful for this so-called stretching. Twentieth century music is often overlooked by audience members and concert programmers alike in favor of music not much older than the turn of this century.

Nineteenth century and older music tend to depend on the composers' skills; 20th century music depends more on the performers' and conductors' skills.

Too many times the audience is unappreciative of this distinction. Simply put, 20th century music is sometimes too difficult and not popular enough to warrant the struggle it takes to produce it correctly.

It was the audience's (and, for educational purposes, the choir's) good fortune this fact was disregarded by Walker when he programmed this concert.

The Chorale performed an all-English program that relied heavily on the impeccably sensitive piano accompaniment of William Wingfield, instructor of music.

The pieces chosen for the select choir were more challenging than the chorale's and were sung in four different languages.

Wingfield hardly touched the keyboard in the Choir's half of the program.

One weakness these groups, and perhaps the conductor, have become most apparent while performing this contemporary music.

There is a general reluctance to submit to the inherent, organic and dynamic phrasing of contemporary choral music and allow it to come through.

So many times the music was dying to respiration and have life Thursday night.

The performances were so restrained and conservative, the music merely existed much of the time rather than had a life of its own.

In rock, it's called groove. In jazz, it's called swing. In contemporary choral music it's called phrasing.

This phrasing usually wasn't there and the music suffered for it.

As in other forms of contemporary art, without interpretation (in this case, interpretive phrasing) the music is boring.

The concert was hardly boring but still could have been more compelling. Where was the energy? The humor? The piety? The connectedness?

This was demanding music, much more demanding than it sounds even when perfectly executed. While perfection is a lot to ask for, more elastic and dynamic interpretation isn't.

On the other hand, the concert was quite enjoyable overall.

One high point was when the chorale attempted to sing what Walker called "Kansas Japanese."

The Japanese fishing song titled "Sohran Bushi" was executed quite remarkably.

Japanese is devoid of the kinds of syllabic accents that are habitual for English speakers.

Walker was obviously aware of this and managed to obtain authentic Japanese diction from the chorale.

Walker's calculated risk paid off in spades.

It was a joy to hear.

It's hard to find fault with a concert when the program was ambitious as this one was so early in the season. The season will only get better.

Bravo to Walker, et al, for undertaking the challenges they did.

Now that they've put both feet into this century they will hopefully stay. After all, the 21st century is almost here already.

Artist's works paint picture of his life

Jamie Willey
staff writer

The minds of students tapped into the life of an artist during a visual autobiography Thursday night.

K-State's Visiting Artists Committee presentation featured the art of Howard Rogovin in a series of paintings titled "The Frieze of Life — The Pursuit of the Marvelous."

Rogovin said the series is narrative art, or storytelling art, and a visual autobiography of himself.

"The fun thing about narrative art is that you can do whatever you want. You make your own reality," he said.

Rogovin said he started working on the series in the 1960s.

His work, which uses characters in different stories, is a dialog describing what it is to be an artist.

Rogovin represented himself throughout the paintings in many different ways.

In some instances he was portrayed as a fool, and in several paintings, he was even a cat.

"I'm basically laughing at the pretensions of being an artist," Rogovin said.

The series is also about a journey, he said.

Sailing ships were a constant theme in many of the works and symbolized the artist was going somewhere, Rogovin said.

Abraham Lincoln and George Washington were depicted in many of the works, as well, because they are great American heroes, and in narrative painting, an artist can paint anything he wants.

Margo Kren, K-State Visiting Artists Committee member, said she first met Rogovin when she took classes he taught at the University of Iowa.

Kren said she likes Rogovin's work because he paints with no pretenses and in an honest way. She also said Rogovin's works make her laugh.

"I find his work humorous in a wonderful way," Kren said.

Rogovin's narrative was also enjoyed by non-art majors.

"I like what he said about the way he can make his own reality, and he doesn't have to justify what's in his paintings," Matt Henry, freshman undecided, said.

Rogovin's works have been shown in many prominent galleries in New York, Chicago, Kansas City, Mo. and Ibiza, Spain.

He also received the National Endowment for the Arts Fellowship for his works.

Cats for Cans helps feed needy families in area

Students will have chances to contribute to the cause in their colleges, organizations and residence halls.

Near the holidays, the underprivileged seem to ask for more and increase in need. And in reality, some of the underprivileged in Manhattan do need a bit more help around the holidays.

Cats for Cans, a student-organized committee, is asking students to reach into their cupboards and pocket books to help a worthy cause — the children of Manhattan.

Riley County has a 21.2-percent poverty level. That means many of the area children get a large dose of their needed daily nutrients from free or reduced school lunches.

The cans of food, non-perishable food items, or money students donate to Cats for Cans will help feed area families during Thanksgiving and semester breaks.

Wildcat fans will have a chance to donate cans of food or nonperishable food items at the game this Saturday. Donations will also be accepted at all the home basketball games before Christmas.

Students will have chances to contribute to the cause in their colleges, organizations and residence halls.

Last year, Cats for Cans collected 79,000 pounds of food for the needy of Manhattan. This year the Cats can top that and provide more food, more cheer and more help.

But don't just dig through your cupboard and grab whatever isn't being eaten.

Instead, provide the families with something they will need and want to eat.

Students will be collecting the food and transporting it to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, where it will then be saved and passed out during Thanksgiving break.

The food collected from students last year fed families during Thanksgiving only, but this year the Cats have the power to feed people throughout Christmas, too.

► IGNORING EDUCATION

Editor,

Understandably, students have been concerned with the proliferation of fees on campus, but inexplicably, students have said little about the possible implementation of a general education requirement that will affect future students more significantly than the proposed fees.

1) The focus of the proposal is not on the content of courses but on the pedagogy adopted. This proposal, which stipulates how instructors must teach their courses, constitutes a threat to academic freedom.

No consideration is given to the type of subject, the nature of the students or the personality of the instructor in mandating the method of teaching.

2) The pedagogical methods advocated in this proposal have singularly failed when implemented at the primary and the secondary level. Aggregate student performance has declined throughout the United States in part because of such pedagogical dicta.

3) Although one of the University's main goals is to ensure "all undergraduate curricula rest upon a common intellectual foundation," no attempt is made in this proposal to address the needs of our students to think critically, write lucidly or compute competently.

4) Admittedly, the Kansas Board of Regents and the North Central Association have underscored the necessity of the University establishing a general education requirement, but this proposal does not satisfy that need. Fort Hays State University and Wichita State University have implemented a general education requirement based on content, as have many of our peer institutions. This proposal parades under the guise of a general education proposal, but in reality, it is a proposal that attempts to mandate the adoption of certain teaching methods.

5) A true general education proposal when adopted will aid K-State in its pursuit of academic excellence. Implementation of this requirement would damage our academic reputation because it does not allow students to take rigorous courses to fulfill the general education requirement. For example, Introduction to Mathematics counts as a general education course, but Calculus does not.

6) In a time of ever scarcer resources, we should be funneling money to courses that challenge our students to excel, not courses based on some arbitrarily defined pedagogy.

► "HARMLESS" WITCHCRAFT

Editor,

This letter is in response to every one of Professor Jacobs' weekly fits.

Do you really think you're destroying Christianity by slamming Christians and making fun of Jesus Christ and bragging about your "faggot" (your word, not mine) lifestyle? Do you really think that you're hurting our feelings with your little tantrums and that we'll just go away if you cry hard enough?

Since the beginning of time, Christians have been tortured, killed and imprisoned. Despite Satan's best efforts, we're still here by the grace of God.

You claim Christianity has a stranglehold on the planet. If that's the case, how do you explain the Holocaust and Rwanda? Sorry, it wasn't the Christians who were making lampshades out of human flesh in Nazi Germany and chopping children's head off in Rwanda. On the contrary, it was your Satanic and atheistic buddies, Heinrich Himmler and Adolf Hitler, who were the brains behind the deaths of 6 million Jews and countless others. Your "harmless" witchcraft-practicing warlords caused more than 1 million innocent people to die of disease and starvation.

► BLOOD DRIVE THANKS

Editor,

I want to thank everyone who was responsible for the huge success of the fall 1995 Bloodmobile on the K-State campus during the week of Oct. 23-27.

The total collection was 781 units, surpassing our goal (and, incidentally, KU's total) by more than 100 units!

Special thanks go to the K-State Student Union, K-State Facilities, area businesses that advertised on their marquees, Manhattan Christian College and the following student organizations that helped organize and advertise the Bloodmobile: Alpha Epsilon Delta, Army ROTC, Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, Circle K, Delta Tau Delta, Golden Key, Pre-Occupational Therapy Club, Pre-Physical Therapy Club and Pre-Vet Club.

And, of course, the event would not have happened without the help of volunteers and the all donors.

Taking action with Safe Zone

The first column I ever wrote for the Collegian was two years ago. It was a guest column about an incident I had witnessed in a back alley in Aggieville.

I feel weird calling it an "incident." It's too antiseptic. What I witnessed was a gay-bashing. I saw two men about to beat the bloody bejeebers out of two others because they had been walking with their arms around each other.

I saw what was going to happen. I heard the first threats. Yet, I didn't do anything to stop it. I didn't call the police or stand next to the two men who were about to be beaten, even though one of them could barely stand. I didn't even acknowledge I had seen they were in trouble.

I just walked on past, minding my own business.

Afterwards, I felt humiliated and angry. I regretted not taking action, for not showing my support and stopping what could have been stopped. It's a regret I'll have for the rest of my life.

I was so ashamed I had done nothing, I wrote a public apology. That was my first column: an apology. (Hard to believe, huh?)

I said I was sorry, not only for my actions, but the actions of the whole society, which allowed that kind of violent hatred to go on. I apologized for the fact that, in my inaction, I had become a part of the problem.

I apologized because homosexuals on this campus and in this town had no rights and no place to go, and I knew they would have to spend the rest of their lives wondering who they could trust, when betrayal could mean more than sour grapes. It could mean death in a back alley.

Since that day, I have written several columns supporting the rights of gay, lesbian and bisexual students. I have made it clear that I will not hide. I will not walk away, and I will not allow what I saw happen to happen again when and where I could prevent it.

It is for that reason I have a small marker posted on my office door with a Willie the Wildcat on an inverted pink triangle. It promises that if anyone who is gay, bisexual or lesbian, comes to me, I will be completely supportive and assist them in any way I possibly can.

My intent is not to make my other students feel uncomfortable or to alienate them in any way. It is an indication I will not alienate anyone for who they are or what they believe.

It is a sign my office is a safe place to be who you are, regardless.

That invitation is extended to anyone. Even those who disagree with my beliefs.

I am also not going to condemn those who condemn homosexuality. It serves no purpose. It won't change their beliefs or help anyone who really needs it. If it is their belief homosexuality is wrong and homosexuals themselves are committing one of the ultimate sins by being who they are, I will not ridicule them for that.

There has been too much ridicule as it is. It seems as if conservative and Christian bashing has become a favorite pastime around here. While occasionally it is easy to do, I don't like that game. I'd rather play basketball.

But by placing that sign outside my door, I and everyone else who has the same sign, have promised to do no harm, neither to the spirit or the mind of any person who comes to us.

We have made a promise not to judge or criticize and to treat everyone, regardless of their sexual orientation with respect and kindness.

Can others who criticize such actions honestly say the same thing about what they are doing?

So, am I going to hell for this? Probably. I don't have "Abraham" etched across my forehead. There are no burning bushes in my front yard, so I don't presume to know the intent of God.

All I do know is I will never stand by again, not when I can provide some kind of sanctuary. If that means I am damned to hell, let me tell you — if God is really the kind of deity who would condemn me for all eternity for loving my neighbor, regardless of their sexual orientation, I'd rather spend it in hell.

Kevyn Jacobs and I have adjoining spots in the sulfur pits all picked out.

Dispelling Halloween misconceptions

Last Tuesday, the Collegian ran the column "Fearful Christians Ruin Children's Halloween Fun," written by Jason Hamilton. It was unfortunate the writer wrote from an ignorant and disrespectful point of view.

He used most of his article to belittle Christians for their beliefs and nearly none to present an intelligent argument. He stated fun and creativity "... has been all but squeezed out of holidays like Christmas by the powerful marketing forces."

I agree, we have lost sight of the true meaning of so many holidays. He also stated Halloween is a nonreligious holiday — he didn't do his homework.

This is college — time to learn. So let's take a moment, after the occurrence of the nation's most shameful holiday, to reflect on how uncool Halloween is.

Although Halloween has come to be thought of as a night of fun, superstitious spells, and eerie games people take only half seriously, its origins were quite otherwise: Halloween practices began more than 2,500 years ago with the Festival Of Samhain, which unwilling participants called the Festival of Death. This festival was used to celebrate the coming of the pagan New Year.

Many of the practices and beliefs of Halloween come from a pagan order of priests called Druids. The Druids would dress up in dark robes (costumes) and go from house to house to collect food for their special diet (treat).

If you did not have what they wanted, your household could be cursed or, the extreme, a loved one would be taken for a human sacrifice (trick). Druid priests would carry lanterns, made of turnips or gourds, with the face of the evil spirit who guided them carved into it (jack-o-lanterns).

As time progressed, other meanings were added to each practice.

The early Catholic church accepted pagan practices and gave them a religious twist. Nov. 1 was made into All Saints Day and honored those saints who had died the year before. The night before then became All Hallowed Evening, which is known as Halloween. This night became a time of mischief and evil doing. This is the night these pagan practices still exist.

The Bible tells us specifically not to take part in the practices that Halloween promotes. Look up Deuteronomy 18:9-12 and 1 Thessalonians 5:22. For a Christian to celebrate Halloween is like a Jew to celebrate Hitler's birthday or an African American to call Mark Furman a civil-rights leader.

Even if you are not a Christian, you must admit the unabashed evil side of Halloween. But, you say that was then, but this is now. Today, the meaning of Halloween has been whitewashed. We see it as just a time to get candy. Just how cool is Halloween? What image does Halloween conjure up? Does your face wrinkle into an evil smile when you think about it?

Witches and Satan worshipers (yes, they really do exist) call Halloween their High Holy Day. This is the night they call for all evil forces to be unleashed. Even if you don't believe in spiritual beings causing evil, look at all of the terrible things that happen and the enjoyment we get out of touching the dark side when we scare kids and conduct haunted houses.

In past years on Oct. 31, Detroit newspaper headlines have read, "Detroit Reels From Yet Another Devil's Night — Millions of Dollars Lost in Arson Fires." At this time of year, kidnappings increase, graves are robbed, candy is poisoned, and people die in Halloween pranks gone wrong. Parents are nervous about sending their children out alone. Schools have to outlaw Halloween because costumes have become gang related and incite violence. Why should we fear something that is supposed to be fun and creative? There are many alternative activities — roller skating, Putt-Putt, games with neighbors, movies and much more.

No Christian is against fun. Halloween appeals to an evil and dark side of fun we should have nothing to do with. Christians aren't crazy as Hamilton's column asserts. Christians have found faith in God and follow the practical teachings of the Bible, something that can't be understood by sophomoric thinking.

Why do we and should we celebrate Halloween? That last question is up to you, but remember the underlying meaning of this holiday. To learn more find the book Live Free, or call (214) 480-0240 and ask for the Halloween packet.

The best place to look and learn is in your Bible. Take time to learn.

REVIEW

Simon's 'Laughter' showcases talent

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

Manhattan got a little taste of classic New York spiel Thursday night with the presentation of Neil Simon's most recent play, "Laughter on the 23rd Floor."

"Laughter" is Simon's semi-autobiographical recount of his days as a junior writer for Sid Caesar's "Your Show of Shows" in the 1950s. It was there Simon worked with the likes of Mel Brooks, Larry Gelbart, and Carl Reiner.

Reiner is most relevant to this play because Reiner created the mother of all sitcoms, "The Dick Van Dyke Show," which closely resembled "Laughter's" tone. "Laughter" was merely written a few decades later.

"Laughter" isn't really a play. Granted, it has its mini-climaxes and mini-epiphanies, but there are no plot lines that necessitate a real ending. It's like "Seinfeld," but set in the 1950s.

The writers' office where "Laughter" is set is not a microcosm of the tumultuous world around it, although Simon tries hard to work in something about McCarthyism and entertainment industry black-listing.

The office is a utopia of liberal funniness. A refuge of Jews and one Irish Catholic, these New York laugh-factories were bastions of intellectualism in a world that was getting increasingly dumber.

The play, if you want to call it that, which we will for the purposes of this review, could have ended halfway through Act Two. There wasn't anything to wait for, just the fact you'd be missing out on a load of good one-liners.

However, that's not all that bad. Why can't you just sit back and let Neil Simon pull your strings for two hours? There are no "real" lines in this play, just jokes. It doesn't matter; the guy's funny.

To get the same amount of humor in just one minute of "Laughter" you'd have to watch a whole night of classic television on Nickelodeon's "Nick at Nite." "Laughter" plays like an episode of "I Love Lucy," "The Dick Van Dyke Show" (of course), or, to a lesser extent, "The Lucy Show" (that Mr. Mooney, what a hoot).

'Laughter' isn't really a play... It's like 'Seinfeld,' but set in the 1950s.

So "Laughter" boils down to a documentary, in stage form, of Simon's unbelievable career as a writer for television.

More than any other writer produced by the first generation of variety television shows, only Simon has given us a consistent grab-bag of hilarious, touching, and memorable stories such as "The Odd Couple" and "Lost in Yonkers."

Sure, Brooks has given us great films (not lately, but he has in the past). Reiner gave us some great television, but where's he been lately? Larry Gelbart, perhaps the least known of the bunch, has written for television and theater, but hasn't produced as much work as Simon.

So, yes, we'll grant Simon a mere two hours of pure, unadulterated fun with "Laughter."

And how can you argue with nine superbly talented cast members? However, playing a cartoon, that is what these characters in essence did, can be much fun if you want to take some chances. And does this cast take chances.

Ron Orbach delivered the role of Max Prince, the star of the faux show, with a delightful unpredictability. His voice and mannerisms hit high and low notes, playing Prince to the hilt as a delirious, pill-popping control-freak.

Ernie Sabella, playing Milt, had most of the good lines, though.

When Val, played by Mal Z. Lawrence, tells Milt "This is not the day to get me upset," Milt fires back "Put me down for Wednesday." Badda-bing-badda-boom!

PHILLIPS TO PLAY AGAINST IOWA STATE

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Nebraska tailback Lawrence Phillips will be on the sidelines this week for the first time in two months. "There's no question that he's got a lot of ability and that could benefit the team," Nebraska running backs coach Frank Solich said. "It will also benefit Lawrence."

Oral Roberts to test Cats

Shana Newell
staff writer

The K-State volleyball team returned home after a tough loss in Lincoln, Neb., Wednesday night.

They will face Oral Roberts University at 7:00 p.m. Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

While not a member of the Big 8 conference, Oral Roberts is part of K-State's district.

After last week's loss to Nebraska, the Wildcats are now 16-8 overall, 3-6 in the Big 8. The Golden Eagles come to Manhattan with a record of 23-1.

"The Oral Roberts matches are huge matches for us," Coach Jim Moore said. "They are below us in the division, but they are 23-1 and have received votes for the Top 25."

The squad has found itself in the middle of a battle for a berth in the Big 8 tournament in Omaha, Neb., later this month. In order to win that battle, the Cats must play well in their remaining matches, including Saturday night's contest against Oral Roberts University.

The Cats need a win against the Golden Eagles this weekend and again on Nov. 15 in order to have a fighting chance of competing at the NCAA Championship Tournament at the end of the season.

"Those two matches coupled with the Colorado match, if we win, gives us an outside chance of making the NCAA tournament," Moore said.

Oral Roberts leads the series with K-State 10-9. The last time the two squads met, Oral Roberts University defeated the Cats in three matches.

This season, the Golden Eagles have returned six members of the 1994 squad.

Although the statistics are stacked against his team, Moore said he is confident about the abilities of the Cats.

"We can beat them if we play well," Moore said.

Playing well would demand sterling performances from a K-State attack which has been lacking.

In the Nebraska match, only two Cats managed to hit above the .000 mark. Senior middle blocker Debbie Miller and junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk hit for .333 and .118 respectively.

For the season, the Cats are led by junior play-setter Yolanda "Toie" Young and DeClerk offensively, while defensively, DeClerk and senior hitter Jill Dugan set the pace.

DeClerk has the team high in kills with 275 and is hitting .363 while Young follows shortly behind with 250 kills, hitting .264.

DeClerk also has 214 digs and another team high with 108 block assists. Dugan leads the team with 270 digs and 12 solo blocks. She also has 51 block assists.

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

When Oklahoma comes to town Saturday for the 1:10 Homecoming game, the 25-ranked Sooners will bring with them a secondary that thrives on man-to-man coverage when they're in it.

So on several occasions, K-State quarterback Matt Miller will have to go to his second or even third options to complete the pass.

One sign of a maturing quarterback is when he looks off his main receiver for one who is open. Such was the case last week for Miller, and it showed how far he's come from earlier in the season, when he would tuck the ball when his primary was covered.

"That's happened quite a bit this year and it's good for Matt," wide receiver Kevin Lockett said. "It shows you that Matt is going through his reads and that if the first guy isn't open, he's going to the second or third guy, which is good and that's important to making the offense work."

With first-year Sooner coach Howard Schnellenberger, the Sooners have been subject to the medium-to-long range pass that plays right into the hands of the Wildcats.

The Sooner pass defense has given up 61 first downs, 1,601 yards passing and 12 touchdowns this season. They gave up 38 points to Colorado and Kansas, while they allowed Iowa State to score 26 two weeks ago.

But last season, K-State quarterback Chad May threw for only 115 yards in the Cats 37-20 win at Oklahoma.

"One of the things about the OU secondary, and this is an honest assessment and I tell everyone this," wide receiver Tyson Schwiager said. "Last year, they were the best secondary we faced, so me, Kevin, Mitch (Running) and Jimmy (Dean) are looking forward to the challenge this week."

Darrius Johnson and Larry Bush will be the cover men at the corners while Anthony Fogle and Rod Henderson will be the safeties.

"They have some great athletes on their defense, and I think one reason they haven't performed as well as they would have liked is because Coach Schnellenberger came in, and they've used some different schemes than in the past couple of years," Lockett said.

"They got some great man-to-man athletes in their secondary, and now they're forced to play a little more zone than they would have liked. We can see that when they play in the zone, they're just a little bit uncomfortable," he said.

The K-State wideouts, even when they are the second or third options on a play, prepare to have Miller throw to them.

"Something we've worked on this year is that regardless of where you are on the field, expect the ball to come to you regardless of the play because anything can break down on a play," Lockett said.

OU will most likely start off in a man-to-man, but have switched to zone coverage in several games this season. Playing zone has been new for the OU secondary because with Gary Gibbs, they were primarily a man-to-man team.

"It's taken some time for them to adapt, but the last couple of weeks they've played well defensively," Lockett said. "I think they've maybe played a little more zone than they have in the past."

If K-State completes some medium-to-long range passes early in the game, look for the switch.

"A lot of teams that come into the game playing man-to-man figure they match up very well with us because neither of us are that fast," Lockett said. "The key is that once we beat them a couple of times early in man-to-man coverage, it changes the game."

The OU defense is led by Cedric Jones, but he's their main man against the run, not the pass.

"Cedric Jones is a great player," Coach Bill Snyder said. "But it takes a lot of guys to be a really good defense and they got a lot of guys who are really good."

Virginia dashes Florida State's title hopes

Associated Press

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — In a stunning upset Thursday night, Virginia snapped Florida State's 29-game Atlantic Coast Conference winning streak and probably ended the Seminoles' bid for a national championship.

Tiki Barber had 311 all-purpose yards and scored two touchdowns and the No. 24 Cavaliers stopped second-ranked Florida State a foot from the goal line on the final play for a 33-28 victory.

"The national championship thing sorts itself out. Tonight, it sorted us out," Florida State coach Bobby Bowden said.

It was Florida State's first ACC loss since joining the league in 1992. The Seminoles (7-1, 5-1) had won their first 29 ACC games by an average margin of 33 points and had beaten their first five league foes this season by an average of 43 points.

"We don't lose often," Bowden said, making the point to his players to "try to be good losers. It's part of life. Nothing lasts forever."

Virginia (7-3, 6-1) played an inspired game against explosive Florida State, which was leading the nation with 56 points and 600 yards per game.

After building a 27-21 halftime lead, the Cavaliers shut out the Seminoles for most of the second half and got two field goals from Rafael Garcia, who had four in the game.

Florida State pulled to 33-28 on Warrick Dunn's 7-yard touchdown run with 6:13 left in the game and drove to the Virginia 6 in the final seconds.

But Dunn was stopped inches from the end zone by Anthony Poindexter and Adrian Burnin on the final play, setting off a wild celebration at Scott Stadium.

The Florida State loss scrambled the Bowl Alliance picture. Had the Seminoles beaten Virginia and gone undefeated, they probably would have played No. 1 Nebraska in the Fiesta Bowl for the national title.

Now, the only way the Fiesta will get two undefeated teams is if Nebraska and third-ranked Florida win out. Florida plays Florida State at Gainesville Nov. 25.

Florida State started the final drive on its own 20 with 1:37 remaining, and quickly marched down the field.

After reaching the Virginia 6, the Seminoles snapped the ball directly to Dunn, who was hit short of the goal by Poindexter and finished off by Burnin.

Barber, a junior tailback, rushed for 193 yards on 31 carries and caught three passes for 45 yards. He also returned six punts for 73 yards.

Virginia and Florida State each have one loss in the ACC. If they tie for the conference championship, the league's berth in the Fiesta-Sugar-Orange alliance would likely go to the higher ranked team.

Barber ran for 111 yards and scored two touchdowns in the first half as Virginia took a 27-21 lead — only the second time in 30 ACC games that Florida State trailed at halftime. The Seminoles trailed Maryland 20-17 at intermission last year before storming back to win 52-20.

Florida State quarterback Danny Kanell threw for 320 yards and three TDs in the first half — a 35-yarder to Phillip Riley, a 14-yarder to Warrick Dunn and a 38-yarder to E.G. Green. The scores gave Kanell 28 TD passes this season and 53 in his career, both school records.

But Virginia controlled the half despite three costly turnovers. Barber's fumble and James Colzie's interception led to Florida State touchdowns, and Byron Capers' goal-line interception stopped a Virginia scoring threat near the end of the first half.

After Kanell's TD pass to Dunn put the Seminoles ahead 14-7 late in the first quarter, the Cavaliers scored 17 straight points on Mike Groh's 15-yard TD pass to Barber, Garcia's 35-yard field goal and a 72-yard catch and run by Pete Allen.

Kanell's scoring toss to Green cut Virginia's lead to 24-21, but Garcia booted a 48-yard field goal with 1:14 left to give the Cavaliers a six-point halftime advantage.

Kanell, who threw only six interceptions in his first seven games, had two picked off in the first half, including a diving interception by Percy Ellsworth at the Virginia 2. The Cavaliers have had at least one interception in 26 straight games.

► MEN'S, WOMEN'S GOLF FINISH TOURNAMENTS

K-State's men's and women's golf teams finished final round action at separate tournaments this week.

The men finished ninth in a 15-team field, shooting 317-302-315=934 at the 54-hole First Annual Indian Intercollegiate Tournament at Bayou Desiard Country Club in Monroe, La.

Stephen F. Austin University won the two-day tournament, firing 894. Northwestern Louisiana State placed second with 907, and Southern Mississippi placed third with 909.

Individually, Wildcat Troy Halterman shot 228 to lead the Cats and tie for 12th in the field. Chad Buckridge placed 38th, Jason Losch tied for 40th, Scott Hovis tied for 47th and B. J. Walter tied for 56th.

Stephen F. Austin's Greg Harper led the field, shooting 221.

K-State's women played the 54-hole 1995 Lamar Lady Cardinal Invitational at the Beaumont Country Club in Beaumont, Texas, and sponsored by Lamar University.

The Cats finished 11th in a 12-team field, shooting 341-333-326=1000. Oregon State won the tournament with a score of 941, followed by North Texas, which shot 962.

K-State's Ann Slater shot 246 to tie for 24th and lead the Cats. Staci Busch tied for 26th, Debbie Chrystal tied for 36th, Rachelle Bond tied for 50th and Trisha Hoover tied for 54th.

Laura Rolf of North Texas led the field, shooting 225.

Russian troops leave for home

Associated Press

FORT RILEY — Salutes to friendship ended the first joint American and Russian military exercise on U.S. soil Thursday, along with thoughts of troops from both nations serving side-by-side in Bosnia.

Speakers at the closing ceremony for Peacekeeper '95, where 150 Russian troops trained with 150 counterparts from the 1st Infantry Division, underscored the importance of maintaining peace in the world.

Col. Gennadiy M. Averyanov, commander of the Russian 27th Guards Motorized Rifle Division, said through a translator that the exercises will benefit the noble cause of securing peace on earth.

The ceremonies were inside a hangar because of the cold, windy weather.

Averyanov said when the troops arrived Oct. 25, the sun was shining.

"Regretfully, people have not learned how to control the weather," he said. "But they can and must control their nations and build them on a civilized basis."

Maj. Gen. Randolph W. House, commanding general of the 1st Infantry Division, headquartered at Fort Riley, concurred.

"What a great day to be a soldier," he said. "Together we can achieve peace in this world, one friendship at a time."

The closing ceremony was conducted in both Russian and English. Hamburgers were served afterward. The troops then played soccer and volleyball.

The Russian troops are scheduled to leave Fort Riley Friday, flying out of McConnell Air Force Base in Wichita on the same day.

"American and Russian soldiers here in Kansas demonstrated to everybody what the relations between the peoples on our planet should be," Averyanov said.

The ceremony came as mediators and leaders of the warring factions in the former Yugoslavia met in Dayton, Ohio, to begin negotiations to achieve peace in Bosnia and Croatia.

Along with those negotiations is the possibility of American and Russian troops being deployed there to enforce any peace settlement.

None of the speakers at the closing ceremonies mentioned Bosnia.

But after the ceremony, Russian Capt. Sergei Kurakov said in an interview through a translator that he believes American and Russian troops need to go to the former Yugoslavia to keep the peace.

Kurakov said the training exercises, which included the types of military operations a peace-keeping force would use, would help if they are deployed.

Pvt. Cebryav Valerii shrugged when asked if he was willing to go to Bosnia.

"We're soldiers," he said. "We'll carry out our orders."

U.S. Army Sgt. Channing Christophe, who trained with the Russians, said he would not object to being deployed to Bosnia.

"To keep the peace, I'm willing to do that," he said.

He also said the Russian troops are well disciplined.

"They're very motivated," said Sgt. Kenneth Simon. "They love American food. They love chocolate for some reason."

Simon said the training exercise

Gang activities, grievances cause jail riots

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Federal officials have detected some inmate gang activity and many different grievances behind the recent spate of disturbances in federal prisons.

Drug sentencing policies and possible loss of weight-lifting equipment were two of the grievances officials said they think might have sparked disturbances.

"There is evidence of gang activity underlying these disturbances," Deputy Attorney General Jamie Gorelick said at a news conference Thursday.

With about 10 disturbances at federal prisons around the country within a couple days last month, Gorelick said FBI agents and prison officials are looking at the extent to which, if any, they were coordinated, but have not reached any conclusions.

Some observers have suggested the incidents were prompted by Congress' recent votes to maintain penalties for distribution of crack cocaine that are 100 times tougher than those for distribution of powder cocaine. The penalty for selling 5 grams of crack is the same as for 500 grams of powder cocaine, at least five years in prison.

On Monday, after the disturbances had ended, President Clinton signed a bill to maintain those penalties despite a recommendation by the U.S. Sentencing Commission that the penalties be equalized.

Crack is primarily used in black communities. Powder cocaine is primarily used in white and Hispanic ones.

Inmates heard about the proposals by watching Congress on prison television tuned to the C-SPAN cable network, Gorelick said.

"The accessibility of C-SPAN to our prisons has made for kind of an interesting communication, if you will, between Congress and our inmate population," Gorelick said.

She said she once jokingly suggested pulling the cable on C-SPAN for a little while, but was persuaded not to do that by Bureau of Prison Director Kathleen M. Hawk.

General Assembly asks U.S. to call off embargo of Cuba

Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — By the largest margin ever, members of the United Nations called on the United States Thursday to end its embargo against Cuba.

It was the fourth consecutive year the General Assembly adopted the non-binding resolution.

The vote was 117 to 3, with 38 abstentions.

Only Israel and Uzbekistan voted with the United States to oppose the resolution. U.S. allies including Canada and France voted for the measure, while Britain, Japan and Germany abstained.

Last year, 101 nations voted in favor of ending the embargo.

"Unpopular as our economic sanctions may be in this body, their continued application is necessary," Victor Marrero, deputy U.S. ambassador, said.

"What is lacking in this unbalanced resolution is any mention of the context of the United States policy, which is the urgent need for meaningful political and economic change on the island," he said.

The resolution calls for an end to the embargo and expresses concern about plans in Congress to strengthen it.

The vote carries no legal weight. The United States is the only country that bans trade with Cuba.

"It is deplorable that an entire people should suffer because of unilateral acts," Cuban Ambassador Bruno Rodriguez Parrilla told the General Assembly.

Congress is expected to vote later this fall to tighten restrictions against Cuba, with Republicans calling for new efforts to deter other countries from investing in Cuba.

Mexico, a major U.S. trading partner, criticized the proposed measures.

"Pressure exerted by one country on another has never been and can never be the best way to achieve an international order governed by law," Mexican Ambassador Manuel Tello said.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Nicholas Burns thanked Uzbekistan, a former Soviet republic, for opposing the resolution.

"We have an improving relationship with Tashkent and President (Islam) Karimov and with his government," Burns said.

Last month, in his first speech before the General Assembly since 1979, Cuban leader Fidel Castro lashed out at the embargo.

The United States imposed the embargo in 1962, three years after Fidel Castro came to power. Washington has repeatedly defended the measure as a way of pressuring Castro to move toward democracy.

► PEACE TALKS

Serbs, Croats doubt peace will last

Associated Press

VUKOVAR, Croatia — While three Balkan presidents sat in the secure comfort of middle America and talked peace earlier this week, Stanoje Sljivic stood among the stark ruins of Vukovar and fumed.

"Mutual hatred is such that no political agreement, nobody's word, nothing can persuade us to live together again," said Sljivic, a 72-year-old Serb, referring to Croats who were once his neighbors.

"Who can trust whom?"

It is the same for almost everyone in this Serb-occupied shell of a town in eastern Croatia, which four years ago shuddered under Europe's worst single artillery bombardment since World War II.

"It's either us or them — no chance for coexistence any more," said Streten Sokic, a Serb soldier crippled by a land mine in Croatia's 1991 civil war.

"Forgiveness needs time and a new generation."

Such bitterness and mistrust are the biggest barriers confronting the Bosnian, Serbian and Croatian presidents meeting near Dayton, Ohio, in an urgent bid for peace.

Though the talks are aimed mainly at halting 3- 1/2 years of bloodshed in Bosnia, it was no surprise that a festering Serb-Croat dispute in eastern Croatia topped the agenda.

Ten thousand people died in Croatia's 1991 war of secession from Yugoslavia, and there will be no peace in neighboring Bosnia if Serbs and Croats start fighting again.

Vukovar is the main town in a strip of land known as eastern Slavonia, the last Croatian territory still held by Serbs.

The once-thriving Danube River town was home to 70,000 people before the war — about 43 percent Croats and 37 percent Serbs.

In November 1991, rebel Serbs backed by the federal army overran the town, all but leveling it in artillery barrages.

Now about 5,000 Serbs eke out an existence there and live in basements and partially restored houses.

Some cafes and shops have reopened in the center, but virtually all other buildings are bombed-out shells.

Vukovar nonetheless remains a powerful symbol of Croatian nationalism, and a tempting target for President Franjo Tudjman's resurgent army.

Tudjman has threatened to retake eastern Slavonia by force, as he did other Serb-held land in May and August, raising fears about another Serb-Croat war.

Under pressure from Washington, however, Tudjman and Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic agreed Wednesday to work on a peaceful reintegration eastern Slavonia and the return of refugees to their homes.

Few people in Vukovar believes that is possible.

"Only a crazy man can stay here and wait for (the Croats)," said Sljivic. "They killed everybody everywhere else where they retook power, so what can one expect them to do here? Of course my bags are packed."

"Politicians pushed us into this, we accepted and the war took its toll," Sokic said, leaning on crutches in front of his home — the cellar of a house full of holes from shelling.

"Now they want everything to stop and everybody to forget. That's impossible ... at least for the majority on both sides."

Dragana Stamenic is one of the few who have pledged to stick it out, but not because of any peace plan.

"If Croats retake Vukovar, let it be," she said in front of a small house she and her family have partially restored. "I have no more will, no strength to fight against the ghost of war."

Goal posts biting dust no accident

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

As Ricky Ricardo would often tell Lucy, "Lucy, you have some splainin' to do."

Well, athletic department, "you have some splainin' to do," too.

At every K-State vs. Kansas football game we win, as we have for the past three years, K-State students get so caught up in the moment, they deem tearing down a goal-post a worthy cause.

And every year they get away with it. There are consequences, though. This year some people got hurt in the process.

Now, before I blame the students (I mean, after all, they're just doing their job), I have a little Watergate-style conspiracy theory to share.

I postulate the athletic department is behind the whole crazy mess. If this University's administration really wanted to put a stop to this "tradition," they could — and easily at that. They could tie rabid dogs to the posts. The fact is, they don't want to.

Why would they want to lose all of that free publicity as hundreds, if not thousands, of bored and uncreative sportscasters across the country close their sports reports with a wacky video of those crazy Wildcat fans tearing down their own goal posts?

I sure as hell wouldn't. That's why it makes complete sense to me that it is in the best interest of Coach Bill Snyder and the good old boys to just let it happen. Hell, maybe they should subsidize hiring students to tear the suckers down.

When I asked Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage Coliseum and KSU Stadium, he said he has never heard of a conspiracy to tear the posts down.

"We do everything we can to discourage it," Thomas said.

Well, isn't that convenient? They wouldn't even admit to it! Paging Richard Nixon...

So, I was thinking, maybe a little outrageously funny act of violence and criminal damage to property is all the local arts scene needs to perk up interest.

Maybe some students in the art department should boil about 500 bags of bow-tie pasta, set up a huge, Old World-style Italian dinner in front of Anderson Hall and serve it with the fork-type-sculpture from King Hall.

That's not funny. That's pee-your-pants funny.

But would that live up to the sheer brilliance of a performance piece like the tearing down of the goal posts? Only the critics know for sure.

I can't imagine the art department pulling something like that off anyway.

First of all, the art department doesn't have roughly 34,000 separate slush funds to finance a commensurate conspiracy. It would take a lot of ticketed gallery openings to raise the kind of dough it takes to blow just one nose in the athletic department.

Secondly, it's not in the best interest of the art department to sacrifice their respectability and reputation for the sake of a Warholian 15-minutes of fame.

Well, athletic department ... tick, tick, tick...

Tickets going, going ...

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

If you still need a ticket for Alpha Phi Alpha Inc.'s fifth annual '95 Neak Frasty Stepshow in Bramlage Coliseum, you might want to hurry.

Streetside Records in Aggieville has sold more than 300 tickets for the 7 p.m. Saturday show, Trent Smith, an employee at Streetside Records, said.

"We originally received 200 tickets from the Alphas, and then we sold out of them," he said. "They supplied us with more tickets, and they are going fast."

The stepshow will, of course, involve lots of steppin'.

"Steppin' is a choreographical routine involving stomping, clapping and chanting," said B.C. Camp II, junior in journalism and mass communications and spokesman and activities person for Alpha Phi Alpha Inc.

He said the steppin' will be judged on originality, style, timing and crowd appeal.

The judges will be a panel that has of one member of the graduate chapters of each of the sororities and fraternities and an independent person picked by the Alphas.

Camp said the stepshow is open to all greek fraternities and sororities. There will also be a prize of $1,000 given to one fraternity and one sorority.

In addition to fraternities and sororities steppin', the group Soul For Real will be performing at the show.

Camp said Alpha Phi Alphas have decided to bring in a black band because the bands that come to the campus and Bramlage only cater to white people's taste.

"There is a need for us to bring in a black band because only white bands come to play in Aggieville and Bramlage, and we feel that we want to do something for the black community," Camp said. "Also, the purpose of the stepshow is to provide entertainment and to give money back to black activities."

Camp said they chose Soul For Real because they are a top-selling group, and they appeal to all races.

"Soul For Real is a crossover group," he said. "This means that they appeal to whites, blacks and a wide variety of people."

Camp said he thinks Soul For Real will bring in more people to the stepshow, but he said he does not think people will be coming just to see the group.

"Last year, we had 1,300 people, and this year we hope to have more than 2,000 people," he said.

Camp said most of the money the Alpha Phi Alphas are using to sponsor the group is coming from their own general funds money. He said the stepshow is not just about making money.

He said the Alphas are offering discounted tickets to Job Corps, and they have given free tickets to the Manhattan Boy's and Girl's Club.

"This isn't just for a profit because we want everyone to come — not just the ones who can afford it," he said.

Camp said it was extremely hard to to bring in the band, not just because of money, but they also ran into unforeseen complications such as trying to find an insurance company to insure liabilities at Bramlage.

"We had problems with many insurance companies that didn't want to insure a rap or R&B band because there would be a black crowd," Camp said.

He also said some members of the Student Senate were not very supportive in supplying funds for the stepshow and the band.

"I just don't think they understand the black greek organization," Camp said.

"They don't know how hard it is to be black in a basically all-white campus. It is frustrating because it is hard to get anything done," he said.

Camp said the Alpha Phi Alphas will donate some of their earnings to two scholarship funds. He said they also want to give money to the Black Student Union to help them plan future activities.

He also said he hopes the Alphas can bring in bigger and better groups next year, like Shai or Jodeci.

The Alpha Phi Alphas usually participate in the stepshow, but they won't this year because of time constraints created by trying to bring in the band, Camp said.

"We want everybody to come out because this is suppose to be a family event," Camp said. "So, bring your grandmas, kids, cousins, etc. to the stepshow."

This is the first year the Union Program Council has co-sponsored an event like a stepshow, CeCe Ridder, advisor of the multicultural committee for UPC, said.

"Our role is to help bring in the band and contact their agent," Ridder said. "Some of our committee members will staff the event, and we also helped with publicity."

She said UPC wants to help sponsor the stepshow because it is something different, and she said she thinks it will attract a lot of attention.

"We are glad to help because the stepshow is multiculturally different and we have had a lot of fun working with the Alphas," Ridder said.

'Dr. Strangelove' author dies at 71

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Terry Southern, whose screenplays for "Dr. Strangelove" and "Easy Rider" captured an anxiety-ridden, rebellious and spaced-out 1960s America, has died at the age of 71.

Southern collapsed last Wednesday at Columbia University, where he had taught an advanced screenwriting course for a number of years. He died Sunday night at St. Luke's Hospital.

Cause of death awaited an autopsy, hospital spokesman Michael Scallan said.

Southern's second novel, "Candy," a smutty take-off on "Candide" that he co-wrote in 1958 under the name Maxwell Kenton with Mason Hoffenberg, won him an underground following. The next year, his satiric "The Magic Christian" brought Southern to the attention of film director Stanley Kubrick, who was looking for someone to help him adapt another novel, "Red Alert," for the screen.

Their collaboration, a classic of Cold War paranoia whose full title was "Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb," was nominated for an Academy Award for best screenplay and received the Writers Guild Award for best screenplay of 1964.

Five years later, "Easy Rider," a drug culture-open road standard that Southern wrote with the movie's stars, Peter Fonda and Dennis Hopper, was Oscar-nominated for best screenplay. "Terry Southern was one of the great satiric writers of our time," said Robert Fitzpatrick, dean of Columbia's School of Arts. "He was a truly independent voice and imaginative spirit and a generous mentor to young writers."

Southern's other acclaimed screen credits include "The Cincinnati Kid" in 1966, which had Steve McQueen and Edward G. Robinson squaring off in a memorable high-stakes poker game, and "Barbarella," a 1967 erotic fantasy starring a wide-eyed and sometimes unclad Jane Fonda.

"He really did produce a tremendous body of work, although we wish there had been more," said his former wife, Carol Kauffman. She has described Hollywood as a terrible influence that undermined his discipline.

Southern told an interviewer two years ago that the important thing in writing was the capacity to astonish.

"The world has no grounds whatever for complacency," he said. "Where you find smugness, you find something worth blasting."

His first novel, "Flash and Filigree," was published in England in 1958. "The Journal of 'The Loved Ones': The Production Log of a Motion Picture," came out in 1965, recounting the history of the screenplay, "The Loved One," that he wrote with Christopher Isherwood.

"Red-Dirt Marijuana and Other Tastes," a volume of stories and essays, came out in 1967.

Southern is survived by his son, Nile, and his longtime companion, Gail Gerber. A memorial service is planned for early December.

senior in Spanish and education, said. "We gave it our all, and everything worked out great."

Some participants were glad all their efforts were finally recognized.

"We worked our butts off for three solid weeks," said Craig Ternes, sophomore in business management and member of Delta Tau Delta. "It's nice to see that it finally paid off."

In other competition, Kappa Kappa Gamma, FarmHouse, and Theta Xi won the bone marrow drive for the greek division. Smith and Smurthwaite Scholarship houses won the bone marrow drive for the residence hall division.

The finals for body building will be at 7:00 tonight at Wagner Field.

inside the stadium, a marquee board will be placed on the corner of Kimball and College avenues.

A marquee board is an electric information center with two screens, one screen facing each street.

"The marquee board will have all sorts of information on it like upcoming sporting events and ticket prices," McMillen said. "During the off season, we'll use it to promote community events."

The project for the new message centers has been in the works for the past three years, McMillen said.

"It's a good time because the start of the Big 12 conference," he said.

While students are starting to get excited about the new screens, some are comparing them to other stadiums.

"I think it will be great for K-State," said Dani Stewart, senior in elementary education and Nebraska native. "But I don't think it will be as cool as Huskervision."

But, Matt Reishus, senior in secondary education, said he likes the idea.

"I think it's an excellent idea," he said. "The purple pit's going to rumble even more."

interested in placing an announcement on the line.

The form included a description and guideline sheet.

Only UAB-registered organizations, institutional services and designated campus entities, can advertise on the line, according to the guidelines sheet.

And events to be announced must be submitted on the announcement request form.

"We encourage all groups to take advantage of this," Wilson said.

"They can choose the type of category they wish their announcement to be under."

The Campus EventLine is similar to other universities information lines. Campus EventLine is primarily sponsored by UAB, UPC and the Fine Arts Council.

They also received support an assistance from Multicultural Services, Heath said.

The 24-hour number to call, starting Monday, for Campus EventLine is 532-6552.

than what they could get at the Salvation Army," Schaeffer said.

The groups have not decided on the location of the sale but will announce the time and place at a later date, she said.

Proceeds from the sale will help fund HIS sponsored activities for international students, Schaeffer said.

"Whatever few extra dollars they make could help any activity that they are trying to plan," she said.

The clothing items that are not bought by international families will be distributed to the Flint Hills Breadbasket and Seven Dolors in Manhattan, she said.

Schaeffer said the response to the clothing drive has been fairly good this year.

"The most successful response has been in Justin. The second day it was there, the box was overflowing," she said. "But there hasn't been a big response from the dorms."

Rotaract, the college-level Rotary club, decided to become involved with this project when HIS, a Manhattan community organization, asked if Rotaract would participate, Schaeffer said.

"Because a large portion of our group is international students, we had an idea of what they go through," she said. "It's nice to be able to help them."

Homecoming weekend's activities kicked off with a bonfire and pep rally Friday night at KSU Stadium.

Spirit banners, floats and pep rallies are also part of K-State's Homecoming tradition, but all of this has a price tag.

► UNION ENHANCEMENT

Fast food proposed

Dana Harding
staff reporter

The K-State Student Union director recommended Friday the Union eliminate in-house food services as part of the Union-enhancement project.

Bernard Pitts, Union director, recommended the Union contract out for traditional food services, such as the Stateroom cafeteria, Bluemont Buffet, Union Station and catering.

He also said the Union should pursue branding for a proposed Union food court.

Branding would mean bringing fast-food franchises into the Union.

The enhancement project was presented to students in spring 1994 for approval. The plan failed by less than 1 percent to get the 60 percent approval needed to go ahead with the project.

Despite the vote, Student Senate and the administration recommended the project to the Kansas Board of Regents, which approved it.

Students pay a $23 enhancement fee for the project. Changes to Union food services is only one part of the enhancement project.

Pitts presented a preliminary draft of his recommendations to the Union Governing Board Thursday.

Although food services changes will be an administrative decision, the board voted to support the proposal.

Pitts said the proposal had not yet been finalized. It will be forwarded to Anderson Hall for a final decision.

However, Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, said Friday Pitts and students had informed him about the proposal, and he said he was ready to move forward as soon as possible after he received it.

"I will administer the decision they have presented because we have relied very heavily on students, staff and consultants," Bosco said. "They have arrived at a hybrid decision that is best for K-State. We are going to move ahead very quickly because many people have invested time and energy working out a very complex problem."

Architects working on the plans for the enhancement project need to know what the Union's plans for food services are before they can start drawing plans for the project.

Because of delays concerning the food service decision and problems concerning codes, construction bids on the project will probably not go out until January 1997.

Specifics on what companies the Union will contract with for food services have not yet been determined.

The original Union-enhancement plan suggested four brand-name franchises be brought into the food court.

Pitts said the Union-enhancement program estimates a minimum of four franchises would be needed to generate the required income for the Union.

He said this was just an estimate because there were several variables involved.

The enhancement plan suggested Mexican and Chinese food, submarine sandwiches, burgers and pizza restaurants be considered for the food court.

However, what and how many food

Engineering students rebuild toys

Heidi Evert
staff reporter

Christmas is coming, and this year Santa has a new group of elves working for him.

The Kansas Gamma chapter of Tau Beta Pi, the national engineering honor society, are busy modifying switches on Christmas toys to make them easier for children with physical limitations to use.

Toys in their original form are often difficult for physically handicapped children to use, said Michael Krier, senior in electrical engineering and president of K-State's Tau Beta Pi chapter.

"Toys the way they are right now are kind of hard for children with problems with the use of their hands to get at," Krier said.

Dean of Engineering Donald Rathbone appropriated the group $250 for the project, which paid for the group to buy toys and batteries.

The group is pulling the switches out of the toys and modifying them in order to hook up a headphone jack.

Switches, which are better suited for children to operate like switches with big buttons, will be hooked into the headphone jack.

"It's a great opportunity for us as engineers to use what little knowledge we have as beginning engineers and apply that to the community," Krier said.

Brad Guenther, senior in electrical engineering and vice-president of K-State's Tau Beta Pi chapter, said he came up with the idea of modifying toys after visiting Manhattan's Assistive Technology Center. The center works with children in a 60-mile radius who have special needs.

Conn Harrison, coordinator for the Assistive Technology Center, said the center has a loan bank in which parents can check out toys which have been modified for children to play with.

The loan bank works well because of the changing desires of the children, Harrison said.

"A lot of times with kids, they have a toy for a while, and then they want something new," Harrison said.

Parents can also bring in toys they want modified, and the center will do that for them,

Proposed changes for Union

- Contract out for traditional food services, such as the Stateroom cafeteria, Bluemont Buffet, Union Station and catered functions.
- Bring four fast-food franchises into the proposed Union food court.
- Contract with a local vendor to provide a convenience store in the Union.
- Separate the information booth from food services so it can focus more on the information services instead of food sales.
- Have vending services remain a Union in-house operation.

Mall to pay rent after 4-year abatement

Nikola Zytkov
staff reporter

The company that manages the Manhattan Town Center has agreed to the city commission's conditions to remarket $18.8 million in mall bonds.

As a part of the remarketing agreement, the city will require the mall to start paying $185,000 rent per year for use of city property.

The city owns the land the mall is on, as well as the parking lot. The mall will start paying rent in 1997 under the agreement.

Because of a 1992 city commission decision to help the mall with its cash-flow problems, the city has been paying the mall's rent for the last four years.

The commission provided Forest City with six conditions that had to be accepted before Forest City, the mall managing company, could remarket outstanding mall industrial revenue bonds, Oct. 24.

The revenue bonds were sold to fund the building of the mall, which opened in 1987.

Another condition of remarketing stated the city-owned parking lot will not be part of the collateral used to sell the bonds.

In case of a default on the bonds, the parking lot would go back to the city instead of the bond holders.

This condition could make the bonds a little more difficult to remarket, Curt Wood, city finance director, said.

"Part of the security of the deal is the parking lot," Wood said. "Investors who purchase the bonds want the security of knowing that if there is default on the bonds, they could sell the parking lot to pay themselves back the money lost on the investment."

This condition could slightly increase interest rates on the bonds, Wood said.

Overall chances for remarketing are good, Wood said. Because the bonds are issued by the city, they are tax-exempt and attractive to potential investors.

Steve Karland, Forest City representative, said the parking lot condition didn't make remarketing easier, but it was hard to predict how much it would hurt remarketing chances.

"You can't always equate them to specific costs," Karland said of the conditions imposed. "It certainly doesn't make the process any easier or cheaper."

Part of the reason Forest City is

► MIDDLE EASTERN PEACE

Political climate uncertain

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

The continuation of peace after the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is crucial to the future of the war-torn country, K-State staff and students said Sunday.

"The peace process itself is crucial to Israel because it is impossible to live so long in war," said David Ben-Arieh, associate professor in industrial and manufacturing engineering.

Rabin, who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1994 for making peace with the Palestinians, was shot to death Saturday night by a right-wing Israeli after speaking at a peace rally in Tel Aviv.

Israeli radio and TV reports identified the gunman as Yigal

Amir, a 27-year-old law student from Herzilya who had been involved in right-wing causes, including setting up illegal settlements in the West Bank.

Pope John Paul II expressed hope that this "serious and sad event will not irreparably disturb the search for peace in the Middle East, but on the contrary will be a new stimulus."

Ben-Arieh said he hoped that the murder would not signal a civil war.

"It definitely signals an uprising," he said.

Itai Margalit, senior in marketing, said he believed many Israelis would switch to left-wing political parties because of the assassina-

Leaders attend ceremony

Associated Press

JERUSALEM — More than 40 world leaders, from American and European presidents to Arab kings, will attend the funeral of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin at Jerusalem's Mount Herzl cemetery today.

The list includes President Clinton, Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin of Russia, Prime Minister John Major of Britain, Prince Charles of Britain, President Jacques Chirac of France and Germany's Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, King Hussein of Jordan and King Hussein of Morocco have also said they will attend the funeral.

Forty-two heads of state and prime ministers had accepted invitations by Sunday evening, and the list was growing steadily. The American guest list might be the longest, including former Presidents Carter and Bush, Secretary of State Warren Christopher and two of his predecessors, James Baker and Henry Kissinger.

For Israel, the Arab participation is particularly significant.

It was the first time Mubarak has agreed to visit Israel since he came to power in 1981. It will also be King Hussein's first visit to Jerusalem as a guest of Israel.

Rabin's most important peace partner, PLO chief Yasser Arafat,

THE BILL SNYDER SHOW

Football coach, Holthus work together to create their own kind of highlight show

Chris May
staff reporter

It's 5:44 p.m. Saturday, and K-State has just handed Oklahoma a loss in front of a purple Homecoming crowd.

So why are Coach Bill Snyder and "Voice of the Wildcats" Mitch Holthus at Dole Hall? They are getting ready for the weekly taping of "The Bill Snyder Show."

Snyder and Holthus walk into the well-lit studio in Dole and take their chairs on the set. Workers make last-minute adjustments to the set while the two men talk about what happened around college football that day.

Producer Norm Burge sits in a separate booth, where he can talk to Holthus throughout the taping of the show through an earphone.

"I'm able to communicate with him and tell him time cues and tell him what camera to look at when he finishes up with his segment," Burge said.

Holthus said he arrives for each taping ready for the show, even though he just finished doing play by play on the radio.

"I make notes all throughout the play-by-play during the game. I prepare for 'The Bill Snyder Show' even though the game is going on. I review my notes, and then I have in my mind questions laid out that I want to ask him," Holthus said.

Holthus said Snyder was a good person to interview.

"He's usually very easy to interview because he is very thorough. He usually gives you fairly long answers," Holthus said.

"The Bill Snyder Show" is not taped like most other coaches' shows are, Holthus said.

"A lot of coaches' shows will watch the plays and talk them over then, and we don't," Holthus said. "I don't like that system, and I don't think Coach does either. It's cumbersome, and it's better to get Coach's mind and let him flow and then put the highlights over what he said."

And that is just what they do. When Holthus and Snyder tape the show, they don't see any of the highlights — they just talk about the game.

"This way, when people are seeing the highlights, they're getting Coach's comments on the highlights, but they're doing it on the standpoint of Coach's thoughts about it instead of reaction from the play. The play fits Coach's feelings, which I like better."

This might, in fact, be a better system for fans, but it is a lot harder for the producer, Holthus said.

"That puts a lot of pressure on the production team, and as a result, Norm Burge stays up all the night every Saturday night putting the show together. It's harder to edit the show, but it's a better show because it flows a lot better," he said.

Burge tapes the segment with Holthus and Snyder, and then he leaves for a couple of hours.

When he comes back around 8 p.m., he works through the night out of his office in Durland Hall until about 6 a.m., Burge said.

Burge said he goes through the game film and finds highlights to put under Snyder's comments.

Then he puts in the player profiles and the dean segments, as well as the commercials, he said.

When he is finished, he sends the completed show over the satellite waves, and it is sent to stations, Burge said.

The show's segments are taped at different times throughout the week.

"The player profiles are done one to two weeks in advance, and our feature writer, Bernie Haney, writes the audio segments," Burge said.

The dean segments were taped four at a

REVIEW

TSL draws crowds with simple tunes

contributing writer

The return of Truck Stop Love attracted an impressive crowd of roughly 200 people Thursday night at Bombers.

Part of the band's appeal is its simple, catchy, contagiously endearing songs, which often draw voices into humming or singing along with songs unheard of before.

Recognized as a central ingredient in the music scene, the band is seen by many people as Manhattan's door opener for local bands, focusing attention on the talent in the Midwest.

"They're really instrumental in the music scene here," said Nick Colby, bassist for Ultimate Fake Book.

"If anything is going to happen with the Manhattan scene, Truck Stop has got to be where it starts," he said. "It revolves around them."

In the five years that TSL has been working together, the band has filtered through 15 members and managed to survive the "short-lived-band" experience.

Among the founding members was Eric Melin, drummer, who has been committed to TSL since the beginning and, along with the rest of the band, is preparing to put his life on hold for the band's third East Coast tour.

"You can't sell records if you don't tour," Melin said. "We're well known in the Midwest, but outside of that, we're still relatively unknown."

"Our hope is just that we can make it on this tour without freezing to death," he said.

With a dedicated, nostalgic fan base and some seniority above the newer bands in the area, TSL is generally considered the most successful of local bands, but there are still those who witness its development as something closer to a sellout rather than a maturity.

"As individuals, they're very amiable, very pleasant to talk to," Blake Fithen, senior in computer science, said. "I just don't like the whole cloak of trendiness they have acquired."

"I have fond, vivid recollections of storage-shed Truck Stop, and Rich's pork chop sideburns and Steve's competent fingerings back before they became marketable," he said.

Opening for the band was Chick Scalletti, a similar sound with more of a combination of an almost classic rock sound with an edge, and a kind of mellow groove with a five-o'clock shadow.

Weather contributes to Homecoming planning

Body builders can't wear gloves that could affect grip or layer clothing for fear of restricted movement. There were participants in T-shirts and shorts in 30-degree weather.

Coordinators of Homecoming 1995 made some foolish decisions last week.

They put many student participants in danger and left hundreds of others extremely uncomfortable Friday night. In the past, the Friday night of Homecoming had body building finals inside Ahearn Field House and Pant the Chant and the pep rally outside at Old Stadium or at the KSU Stadium.

During body building finals and the rally this year, all events were outside at KSU Stadium, despite brutally cold temperatures.

Fans watched in dismay as the five body building finalists dropped stunt after stunt, unable to hold girls up because of numb hands and shaking bodies.

Luckily, no one was hurt. But someone could have been hurt. This editorial could have been addressing this issue because a student had been seriously injured or even killed.

But that doesn't mean coordinators shouldn't do serious thinking about having these events inside next year.

Sure, the view was better at the stadium, and there was more room for participants and fans.

But the safety of the body builders should have been the first priority.

Body builders can't wear gloves that could affect grip or layer clothing for fear of restricted movement. There were participants in T-shirts and shorts in 30-degree weather.

They can only go where they're told to go and do the best they can.

Next year, the coordinators should have the foresight to see that if Homecoming occur in early November, it's probably going to be too cold for participants to contribute safely.

IMMORTALITY LOTTO

Editor,

During the course of my first semester here at K-State, I have heard and read some fallacious statements made by protesters of Fred Phelps and other radical right-wingers. Don't get me wrong, I don't approve of Phelps or his methods, but God does hate sinners.

Many people on campus have the mistaken notion that God hates sin, but not the sinner — wrong. You cannot separate the sinner from the sin. When separated, you have denied responsibility for your own actions.

For example, does a person who has murdered people without remorse deserve our love, much less deserve to go to heaven? I think not. But isn't God a god of love? You bet, but his love is not up for grabs. It only goes to his chosen few.

The proper view of mankind is we are not basically good, but a combination of all the nasty cuss words you can think of.

God extends his love to a select few of us jerks because we could never, ever earn it.

It's basically a very high-stakes lottery for eternal life, the losers receiving eternal death. The odds favor no one, and there is no room for agnostics.

TRUTH ABOUT PAGANISM

Editor,

The following is in response to Patrick Smolen's guest column.

I do not know where you got your information on Halloween, but it most certainly was not from somebody who knows what they are talking about.

First, the Druids never wore black, only white. This symbolized the purity of their hearts, bodies and minds. They did not celebrate Halloween, which is a Christian holiday, but Samhain, which is on the first full moon in Scorpio. It's Tuesday, Nov. 7. Samhain is also called "Ancestor Night" because it is the time of year when the veil between the physical and spirit worlds is lifted. People would leave food out for their ancestors, a remembrance. As spirits, they could not of course eat the physical food, but the spirit, or remembrance, of it. Ever leave flowers on a loved one's grave? It's the same thing.

The Druids did not gather treats, nor did they curse the house, but one's ancestor does get rather upset when forgotten. Somewhere along the line, some enterprising or lazy (take your pick) people decided it was easier to gather food left out for the spirits, than from the fields. They dressed up so as not to be identified. If anyone saw them, these spirits threatened them.

Finally, although I'm not a satanist, (sorry, I don't believe in the bogymen anymore), I do know that Halloween is not the "high holy day" of satanists.

Satanism is based on glorification of the self; therefore, an individual's birthday (I'm sure you, too, celebrate those, don't you?) is the "high holy day."

As a spokesperson for your religion, you leave a bad taste for Christians in my mouth. If you want to judge paganism, learn the truth — ask a pagan. If you wish to remain ignorant, keep going to church every week.

Paganism thrives through diversity

Last week, I talked briefly about the history of Christian oppression of pagan and their modern counterparts, the neo-pagans.

As a letter in Friday's Collegian responding to my column clearly illustrates, Christian hatred and religious intolerance of neo-pagan beliefs is present at this campus.

The animosity pagans face is real. It is also undeserved.

So just what do neo-pagans believe?

This is not an easy question to answer because it is impossible to make broad generalizations that apply across the board. There are about as many pagan belief systems as there are neo-pagans.

Most neo-pagans believe diversity is the natural order of the universe — just as an ecosystem is strengthened by diversity, so are human belief systems. It is this belief that there is no "one true way" that has most often brought pagans into conflict with Christians.

The best I can do is point out some common themes that run through most neo-pagan beliefs while stressing that nothing I say applies to all. I must also caution that this is my interpretation of neo-pagan beliefs, and others are free to disagree with me or have other interpretations.

Neo-paganism is not a rigid, structured belief system. There is no one sacred text to provide guidance, nor is there a structured hierarchy or church body.

Neo-pagans tend to be individualistic, non-conformists and inclined to keep to smaller groups, such as covens or tribes. Many practice as solitaires, following their faith on their own instead of in groups.

Needless to say, if you are a person who needs a rigid belief structure around you and need absolutes of right-and-wrong or black-and-white to function, then neo-paganism is probably not for you.

Neo-paganism is an intuitive faith, not a literal one, and neo-pagans are often happy functioning in a world of grays and relativism. There also does not appear to be any widespread neo-pagan belief in a final judgment or life after death, at least not in the same way Christians view it.

Although evil and good can be said to exist in many neo-pagan beliefs, they are usually both appreciated as part of the natural and necessary balance of existence.

Both the hunter and the prey are part of the natural order, and thus both deserve respect and reverence.

Neither is truly good or evil, as in the Christian sense.

It is the Earth and the natural world around, which most neo-pagan beliefs center. Homo sapiens is not seen as apart from nature, as Judeo-Christian philosophy teaches, but instead part of it. Human beings are generally not seen as having an exalted place in the rest world — as part of the natural world, we are not above all the other animals.

This sense of oneness with nature, and the unity of nature, stems in part from the neo-pagan belief in eminence — that is, the belief that divinity is manifest in all things. God is not a separate thing from man and nature, She IS man and nature, and present in all things.

Divinity is present in all things, and everything is a manifestation of the divine.

Going hand-in-hand with the philosophy of eminence is polytheism — the belief in many many goddesses and gods.

In my experience, most neo-pagans feel that goddesses and gods are masks that the divinity of the universe wears — shorthand ways for us to express and pay reverence to those aspects of the universe that surround us and permeate us.

Goddesses and gods are imbued with aspects that reflect the nature of the universe — such as Artemis with the power of women and the hunt, Osiris and Kali with the dead, Coyote with the fickleness of the universe. By worshipping a particular deity, a neo-pagan is paying reverence to the aspect of existence that deity represents.

Most neo-pagans don't have a belief that these deities actually have a discreet existence as individual beings (although some do), and most neo-pagans feel comfortable picking and choosing between gods and goddesses from many cultures and mythologies.

It is not uncommon to find neo-pagans worshipping Greek gods alongside Celtic, Egyptian, Australian Aboriginal or Native American ones because all are seen as having been created by human beings to describe aspects of the greater whole.

Next week, I'll wrap up my series on neo-paganism with an explanation of how modern pagans worship — through ritual and magic.

Deregulation presents options for Energy industry

Recent decades have seen the deregulation of the long-distance telephone service and the airline industry. The 1990s may be the decade for the deregulation of the energy industry.

Energy competition is the stealth issue of the 1990s. It has enormous implications for consumers everywhere. However, it remains almost a complete mystery to most of us.

Long-distance telephone companies and airlines have made the transition from regulated monopolies to market-driven service providers, and electric utilities appear to be moving toward a competitive environment of some kind that is unknown.

Numerous complex questions have arisen about the transition. How are all consumers, residential users, as well as large industrial concerns, going to be ensured of the benefits from competition? There's also the issue of how to guard against the re-emergence of monopolies as regulatory safeguards are removed in anticipation of free-market competition.

According to the Haney Group of Madison, Wis., rates for residential electricity varies widely from one region of the country to another. At the present time, I really don't know if the $32 I will pay to KPL Gas Service from my usage during the month of October is too high or just about right.

The rate I pay for electricity and gas, in the present monopoly environment, is based from costs incurred by KPL to generate the electricity, plus a guaranteed return on KPL's investment.

If a competing utility were to offer to provide my apartment with electricity and gas, what would be the most important considerations in persuading me to switch? Lower rates? Higher reliability? Better customer service?

I would probably choose the company with the lowest rates. But, would my savings be outweighed by the hassles of dealing with competing companies, which I am presently doing with respect to my long-distance service?

I have switched long-distance carriers three times in the last year. I get really tired of dealing with the hassle of trying to get the best deal.

Several states are in the process of authorizing competition in the sale of electricity to commercial and residential users. The most important issue of competition among energy providers is the monetary savings to consumers.

In a competitive marketplace, energy providers seeking to build and maintain market share will be driven to offer new services and convenience items, which could make it easier to manage a household.

California has been considering establishing a statewide pool. Pooling, under the California plan, would allow an agency to buy energy in bulk and resell it to end users.

Pooling might produce lower costs for consumers, but consumers would not have a choice of competing providers because everyone would buy from pool.

Pooling is just replacing one monopoly with another, which then could be prone to political influences. Consumers still wouldn't have the ability to choose a company offering the lowest rate or better service.

I believe the transition to market-driven service providers is the right one and should have been done a long time ago. The consumer has benefited from the deregulated monopolies of the recent decade. Technology is leading this change in the market structure of the energy industries.

Monopolies have only hindered the innovation of new and better services and potentially caused the consumer to pay more for energy, which all are bad in a free-market economy.

Purple Pride reached its peak this weekend as Homecoming 1995 wrapped up in style.

The weekend's activities kicked off with a bonfire and pep rally Friday night at KSU Stadium. Before the bonfire, students from fraternity and sorority houses competed in body building competition finals.

"It was awesome. There was so much spirit for K-State at the bonfire. The energy was alive tonight," said Kristy Jantz, president of Sigma Kappa sorority and senior in dance and early childhood education.

Becky Klingler, director of constituent programs for the KSU Alumni Association and Homecoming organizer, said the turnout at the bonfire was great.

"We had about 300-400 more people that came that weren't even involved in a fraternity or sorority," Klingler said. "It was cold, but everyone had a great time. I think this is one of the best turnouts that we've ever had."

The Chi Omega, Delta Tau Delta and Phi Gamma Delta teams swept the body building competition, electrifying the crowd with their routine of dancing, clapping and formations.

"The enthusiasm was great," said Adam Gaines, Fiji's president and senior in operations management. "We started working on our program four or five weeks ago, and it was a great one to win.

"It was awesome. I couldn't even hear the music when we were going. I think we won because of the crowd participation. They were really rocking. I've been here four years, and it's great to finally win one."

Numerous colorful floats, with different variations of this year's Homecoming theme, "Wildcats Rally for Big 8 Finale," dotted the streets of Manhattan Saturday morning.

"The students really had so much fun with this year's theme," Klingler said. "They got into it and did some wonderfully creative things. The floats are just great this year. This is more fun with this theme than with any other."

The parade welcomed fans to game day, with the Big 8 Conference Commissioner Carl James as the Head Marshal.

"It's a great honor to have Carl James here," Klingler said. "Our Homecoming committee nominated him, and he was their first choice. It's great that he made the trip here to participate in the homecoming activities."

Teams of fraternities, sororities and residence halls participated in the parade.

The overall Homecoming award went to the ChiOs, Fijis and Delts. They wrapped the title up by capturing first place in the spirit award.

"We knew that we would have to go nuts," Gaines said. "We took third with our float, but the spirit award and the body building wrapped it up for us. Everybody worked so hard to get this award. I'm proud of everybody in the houses."

Homecoming was over after K-State stomped the University of Oklahoma at KSU Stadium.

K-State dominated from the beginning and beat the Sooners 49-10. This marked the sixth-straight Homecoming win for the Wildcats.

"I'm sure the crowd enjoyed the game," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

"That's what Homecoming is really for — the fans and the students."

Members of K-State fraternities and sororities march down Poyntz Avenue in the Homecoming Parade Saturday morning. The parade, which started in Manhattan City Park, wound through Aggieville, down 11th Street and down Poyntz Avenue to Manhattan Town Center.

Homecoming activities cost groups more than $115,000

(STORY BY J. SCOT)

Spirit banners, floats and pep rallies are all part of K-State's Homecoming tradition, but all of this has a price tag.

Participation in this year's Homecoming cost student living groups more than $115,000, according to totals from the Homecoming chairmen in some of the living groups.

Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said fraternities and sororities were limited on what they could spend for floats and spirit banners.

"I know for floats they can spend no more than $1,200 and $50 for the banners. There were 12 groupings of fraternities and sororities and six groupings between residence halls and scholarship houses who participated," she said.

The all-University Homecoming committee, which is part of the KSU Alumni Association, sets limits of how much can be spent, she said.

"The Greeks for Homecoming spend a ton of money on party favors," Bret Williamson, president of Watson Ink, said.

This year, about $15,000 was spent at Watson Ink by living groups who bought merchandise, he said.

"We have three big money-makers including Homecoming, Open House and lately, when K-State goes to a bowl game," he said.

Becky Ballard, co-owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, said the six groups who did business with them spent about $50,000.

The amount of money spent varies each year, she said.

"Living groups are spending more," Ballard said. "We do have houses who are conscious of the cost and have a specific amount they do not want to go over."

Jeff Ernzen, Kansas regional manager for It's Greek To Me, said he did not think living groups were spending more.

"But it is the clothing costs which goes up each year," he said.

It's Greek To Me sold about $25,000 in Homecoming memorabilia this year, he said.

"The fall, in general, is a busy time for us, and Homecoming contributes a large portion of sales," he said.

Renelle Everett, senior in accounting and Alpha Delta Pi member, said fraternities and sororities were given budgets by the Alumni Association Homecoming committee.

"This year it was $1,000 per house for everything, except we buy our own sweatshirts and stuff," she said.

K-State 8-1 after routing Oklahoma 49-10

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

Each Sunday morning, K-State coach Bill Snyder makes a list of what he didn't like about his team's performance the day before. On most occasions, the list is a few pages long.

But this Sunday morning was different — a day after No. 7 K-State's 49-10 blitzkrieg of then-No. 25 Oklahoma, Snyder's list was a tad shorter.

"I only had a few pages of notes," Snyder said. "That's usually a decent sign."

Another decent sign was quarterback Matt Miller completing 20 of 25 passes with 273 yards and three touchdowns, giving him the school record for touchdown passes in a single season. Another decent sign was the K-State defense holding Oklahoma to 13 yards rushing.

The final decent sign was the special teams setting the tone for the day with a blocked punt that was returned for a touchdown less than three minutes into the game.

"I can go through and find reasons why it wasn't a perfect game and areas where we still have improvements to make," Snyder said. "But we played well and certainly are on the right track."

The win marked the third-straight year K-State has defeated Oklahoma. Before the Cats defeated the Sooners 21-7 here in 1993, Oklahoma had defeated K-State 56 out of the last 58 games, including streaks of 22 straight and 32 straight.

For the Sooners (5-3-1), things have reached a new low as they suffered their worst loss in 50 years.

"It's obvious that this game was a low point in our struggle to revive this program," Oklahoma coach Howard Schnellenberger said.

"This is the worst physical beating a team that I've been associated with has taken."

While nothing could go right for OU, K-State's offense, defense and special teams all had shine.

Offensively, Miller said he played his best game of the season.

"I think it was probably my best game so far," he said. "I've improved as the season has gone on, and each game coming up is supposed to be your best game."

"The coaches do a great job working with me every week, working on the things I'm not doing so well. Coach (Ron) Hudson is a great quarterback coach, and Coach Snyder is a great coach, and they get me ready."

With the Cats leading 7-3 late in the first quarter, K-State put together another of its workman-like drives. Starting at the Cats' own 20, Miller hit Mitch Running for gains of 22 and 9 yards to the Oklahoma 49. Six plays later, Miller hit a wide-open Running for a 34-yard score to make it 14-3.

"I think they busted a coverage," said Running, who made four catches for 70 yards and tied the K-State record for consecutive games with a catch in 32 games. "There was nobody out there."

On K-State's next series, Miller had completions to Lockett of six and 32 yards, followed by a Miller run for 12 yards to put K-State at the 13. On third-and-five from the OU 8, Miller connected with Lockett to make it 21-3 with 8:31 left in the first half. During the play, K-State used five wideouts with Lockett isolated on the left side, where Miller threw the fade and Lockett hauled it in.

"Today, we were on the same page offensively from beginning to end," said Lockett, who led K-State with eight catches for 117 yards. "They had great coverage on us all day, but we made the catches."

Aside from throwing for three touchdowns and becoming one away from tying the Big 8 single-season record of 20, held by Nebraska's Vince Ferragamo in 1976, Miller also rushed for two touchdowns.

"He's been very steady in his progress," Snyder said.

"It's gone in an upward spiral virtually week-in and week-out, with a couple of exceptions."

"But he did a nice job of making decisions, he did a nice job of getting us into the appropriate plays, he didn't make critical errors in regards to a turnover, he didn't put the ball on the ground. And he didn't do any of the things that are negative aspects of a quarterback's game."

Defensively, K-State held Moore to his lowest rushing output since Oct. 16, 1993, against Colorado, and allowed the Sooners to rush for only 84 yards of the day. K-State cornerback Chris Canty picked up two more interceptions and returned the second 39 yards to provide the final score.

"Chris has really come on," Snyder said.

"He plays with exceptional confidence for a cornerback."

In six home games this season, K-State has recorded three shutouts, allowing only 24 points in the other three games.

"We played pretty well," K-State defensive end Dirk Ochs said. "We had some breakdowns, but we did a pretty good job overall."

For the special teams, Running returned five punts for 76 yards, and Clyde Johnson's blocked punt early in the game led to Gordon Brown's 17-yard touchdown return, which gave K-State some early breathing room.

At 8-1, the Cats are two wins away from a likely Cotton Bowl bid Jan. 1.

"We're a good offensive football team, we're a good defensive football team, and we're good in the special teams," Snyder said.

"But I think we were also good mentally. We didn't make a lot of mental mistakes. I thought our focus has been vastly improved and very good."

Lockett is sensational in 8-reception game

Todd Stewart
assistant sports editor

Just how good is wide receiver Kevin Lockett?

"He's the best player in the nation," K-State quarterback Matt Miller said. "He should be an all-American, and I'll do everything I can to try and get him an all-American."

Lockett's eight receptions for 117 yards and one touchdown helped propel the Wildcats to a 49-10 win against Big 8 rival Oklahoma Saturday.

But there was one catch people talked about after the game.

On a third-and-three play from the K-State 43-yard line, Miller found Lockett streaking down the right sideline, leaping over a Sooners cornerback. And when the two picked themselves up from the ground, the ball was in Lockett's hands.

"I just laid the ball up and knew he was going to catch it," Miller said. "He's Kevin Lockett, and that's what he does."

All from a play Lockett said he didn't think was supposed to go to his side.

"It was one of those plays that rarely comes out," Lockett said. "I don't think it was designed for me, but I think Matt saw me down the sideline in single coverage and decided to give me a shot."

Fellow wide receiver Mitch Running said he had every bit of confidence in Lockett to make the catch.

"He's a spectacularly acrobatic man," Running said. "He has some good hops — he can get up. All you have to do is throw the ball up, and he'll catch it."

Miller agreed, saying the quarterback did not deserve the credit.

"It's just a pleasure to be on the field with the receivers I've got," Miller said. "It's just my job to get the ball there."

Lockett's eight receptions Saturday place him second in the Cat football record books for both receptions and receiving yardage. His three-year total is 133 catches and 2,010 yards.

And the list goes on and on for Lockett.

He was tabbed a unanimous preseason all-Big 8 receiver, is a Biletnikoff Award candidate for the second consecutive year, has made second-team all-Big 8 twice and was the Big 8 offensive player of the week this season.

And the junior from Tulsa, Okla., still has one year left. But more than anything, he's looking forward to his next trip home to brag to his friends about beating their favorite Sooners.

"I can't wait to go home for Christmas and see those guys in Tulsa," Lockett said.

But don't think Lockett is different this year than he was before, Coach Bill Snyder said. Now, he's just stepping up when the team needs him.

"He just seems to make more and more plays," Snyder said. "Those were tough plays."

Snyder said if it looked like Lockett was having fun on the field, he probably was.

"Kevin enjoys himself," Snyder said. "He really has fun playing."

But the leader of the Kevin Lockett fan club is probably his quarterback.

"It's beyond amazement now with the things he does," Miller said. "He's just a spectacular player."

GASKINS, SNYDER SEMIFINALISTS FOR FOOTBALL NEWS AWARDS

Football News magazine has named Wildcats Bill Snyder and Perrell Gaskins as semifinalists for its Coach and Player of the Year awards.

Gaskins, a linebacker who leads the Cats with 73 tackles, is one of 15 finalists for Defensive Player of the Year honors. He is also one of 10 semifinalists for the Butkus Award, given annually to the nation's top linebacker.

Oklahoma defensive end Cedric Jones, Nebraska outside linebacker Jared Tomich and Colorado linebacker Matt Russell, are also semifinalists.

Five finalists will be announced on Nov. 17.

Snyder is one of 10 coaches chosen this year, joined by Big 8 colleagues Glen Mason of Kansas and Rick Neuheisel of Colorado.

Three finalists will be announced Nov. 17.

The winners of each award will be announced Nov. 29.

An early bowl guide, OU's 'mystique' and other thoughts

Where to begin...

The top is always a good place. And Nebraska solidified its hold at the top Saturday, crushing Iowa State and picking up most of the first-place votes Florida State lost Thursday night.

But Ohio State picked up some of those votes, too. And there lies the problem. Unless the Buckeyes get upset at Michigan Nov. 25 (or Kansas manages to beat Nebraska next weekend), Nebraska and Ohio State will hold the top two spots, yet still be locked out of a championship game.

If both teams win their respective bowl games, the Big 10 will likely be shut out of the national championship despite having an undefeated team finish a grueling schedule.

If that happens, it shouldn't take long for the Big 10 and Pac-10 to work the Rose Bowl into the Bowl Alliance picture for a four-game national championship...

How are the bowls shaping up?

As per Alliance guidelines, the Fiesta Bowl will get the first two picks from the Atlantic Coast, Big East, Big 8, Southeastern and Southwest conference champions and Notre Dame.

The Orange Bowl will choose third and fifth, with the Sugar Bowl taking the fourth and sixth selections.

Nebraska still looks good to play in the Fiesta Bowl against the winner of the Nov. 25 Florida-Florida State game.

Orange will opt for the Florida-Florida State loser with the third pick, and probably get a 9-1-1 Texas, the likely SWC champ, with the fifth pick.

Sugar will take an 8-2-1 Notre Dame with the fourth pick and get left with an 8-3 Virginia Tech, the likely Big East champ.

As for the rest of the Big 12 package (because all of our bowl contracts were negotiated with the Big 12 in mind):

Cotton Bowl — K-State vs. Pac-10 No. 2 Oregon.

Holiday Bowl — Texas A & M vs. Western Athletic Conference champ San Diego State.

Alamo Bowl — Kansas vs. Big 10 No. 4 Penn State.

Copper Bowl — Colorado vs. WAC No. 2 Brigham Young.

Aloha Bowl — Texas Tech vs. Pac-10 No. 4 Stanford.

Others of interest:

Rose Bowl — Big 10 No. 1 Ohio State vs. Pac-10 No. 1 Southern Cal.

Gator Bowl — SEC No. 2 Arkansas vs. Big 10 No. 2 Northwestern.

Outback Bowl — SEC No. 3 Tennessee vs. Big 10 No. 3 Michigan.

Independence Bowl — at-large Oklahoma vs. at-large Louisiana State...

I suppose a little analysis of Saturday's K-State-Oklahoma game would be appropriate.

The Cats outplayed Oklahoma in every category. But Sooners fans, don't be disappointed. OU still has "mystique."

"You can't talk about the Big 8 and not talk about Oklahoma," Sooners offensive tackle J. R. Conrad said during Oklahoma's media day in August. "Anytime you talk about national powerhouses, people say Notre Dame, USC and Oklahoma..."

"I've never heard a person talk about mystique and say Kansas State."

Yeah, these teams with mystique are a combined 20-6-3 this season. "Mystique" might be cool, but it doesn't win games...

And speaking of winning games, I was as happy as a kid in a candy store when I got to witness the worst pasting Oklahoma has received in 50 years.

It's probably hard to find a Cat who didn't grow up watching the Sooners run up the score against K-State at every opportunity. And we let them do it, even helped make it easier by selling our home games and playing in Norman.

Not that we had much choice. We couldn't give tickets away in the mid-to-late 1980s, and we made a lot more money taking the guarantee from a sold-out Owen Field.

But the tables have turned. More than 40,000 turned out to watch the Cats stomp Oklahoma. And the red-clad fans of the Sooners Nation began to trickle away in the middle of the third quarter...

And speaking of fans, I've received a number of e-mail congratulations from Kansas fans in the last week. Seems they were just proud of their team and school and didn't like my dissing on them in their own paper.

But, one was more than willing to diss on his fellow Jayhawks.

"Oh, by the way, I don't claim any of my 'school-mates' because they are a bunch of spoiled-rotten mommy's boys from Johnson County," one wrote. "I bet their mommies are still holding them trying to stop their crying..."

With that, the sports editor wishes it to be known that he does not support the views that get e-mailed to him — he just has a tendency to print them.

Netters defeat Oral Roberts in 5-game match

Rich Peffley

staff reporter

The K-State volleyball team ended a three-match losing streak Saturday night at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats dumped Oral Roberts in a five-game thriller 15-9, 9-15, 15-12, 4-15 and 15-12.

"They're a very good volleyball team," K-State coach Jim Moore said of ORU.

"They show great ball control, pass extremely well and play great defense. It was a pretty high-level volleyball game."

The Cats got off to a quick start winning game one. They hit .242 to ORU's .097 to jump out to the early match lead.

The Golden Eagles came right back to capture game two, pounding out 21 kills in the game to K-State's 10.

The Cats fought back in game three to take a 2-1 advantage in the match. The Cats hit an impressive .314 in game three, registering 21 kills.

ORU wasn't finished yet, however. It dominated the fourth game, hitting .538 and sending the match into the rally-scoring fifth game.

"I wasn't too worried then," Moore said. "My philosophy in rally scoring is if you're within four points early, you're still in the game. You're OK if you just calm down and sideout."

The Cats trailed 5-7 at the halfway point of the deciding game but rallied for five-straight points to make it 10-7 and then went on for the win.

"We absolutely had to have it from an emotional standpoint," Moore said of the win.

The Cats had four players with double-digit kill totals. Junior Kate DeClerk and freshman Kim Zschau registered 13 each, while junior Yolanda "Toie" Young and freshman Val Wieck each had 12. Sophomore setter Devon Rynning dished off 48 assists in the match.

The Cats were solid defensively as Wieck had nine block assists and one solo block to lead the Cats. Young recorded 12 digs and Rynning and DeClerk each had 11.

With the win, K-State is now 17-8 for the season. ORU, which had received enough votes to be ranked 26th in the AVCA Coaches poll, fell to 23-2 on the year.

The Cats return to action Wednesday night to close out the home portion of the 1995 schedule. The Cats will be host to Kansas in a 7:30 p.m. match at Ahearn.

Kansas City defeats Washington 24-3, retains AFC lead

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs picked a good day to have an off game.

For one, they were home against Washington, a team winless on the road. For another, Redskins' quarterback Gus Frerotte had his worst day of the season as the Chiefs came off their bye week with a 24-3 victory that kept them atop the AFC with an 8-1 record.

"We're pleased with this victory, but we know it wasn't pretty," wide receiver Lake Dawson said.

The Chiefs, who fretted about losing their momentum after taking their bye week, weren't as sharp as they had been while winning seven of their first eight. They had more penalty yards (72-49) and fumbles (2-0) than the Redskins, and Steve Bono, who had been averaging almost 220 yards passing, hit 21 of 37 for 201.

"The problem was we just never could put the game on ice in the second half," guard Dave Szott said. "Our timing just wasn't what it had been. I hate bye weeks."

Bono's day included a 19-yard scoring pass to Willie Davis after Marcus Allen's 1-yard touchdown run as the Chiefs opened a 17-3 halftime lead. Lin Elliot had a 38-yard field goal at the end of the first half.

But the Chiefs could not put away the injury-weakened Redskins (3-7) until Kimble Anders broke loose on a career-long 40-yard touchdown run with 2:26 left.

Frerotte, with his top two receivers out with injuries, hit only 11 of 34 for

It's good to have time off. But when you're on a roll like we were, you hate to take it .... The edge falls off a little bit.

TIM GRUNHARD
KANSAS CITY CENTER

140 yards. He was pulled for Heath Shuler after misfiring on four straight passes with the Redskins behind 17-3 early in the fourth quarter.

"He was frustrated by the rush, and a lot of guys weren't getting open," Washington coach Norv Turner said. "When his frustration level rose, he started missing some guys that were open as it went on."

"A few I missed, a few were dropped," said Frerotte, who came in as the second-leading passer in the NFL with 240 yards a game. "We just couldn't get that big play to get us over the hump."

After taking their own bye week, the Redskins return to play Seattle on Nov. 19. Turner was uncertain who would start at quarterback.

Bono said the offense sputtered at times.

"Obviously, there were too many misses," he said. "But I thought the timing was pretty good."

With the help of what amounted to a 45-yard penalty against the Redskins, the Chiefs scored on their opening drive for the first time this season. After Washington failed to move on its first possession, Matt Turk's punt died at the Chiefs' 5.

But the Redskins had to kick again when called for an ineligible man downfield. This time, Tamarick Vanover returned it 35 yards to the 50. Bono hit Keith Cash for 16 yards and Allen went up the middle for 10 as the Chiefs marched 49 yards in nine plays. On fourth and goal from the one, Allen dived across for his 101st rushing touchdown.

"It's good to have time off," Chiefs center Tim Grunhard said. "But when you're on a roll like we were, you hate to take it. When you sit out a week, the edge falls off a little bit. But starting with a touchdown in the first quarter gave the guys a lift."

The Chiefs, 10 of 12 on fourth downs this season, faced a fourth-and-7 midway through the second quarter from the Redskins 34. Bono connected with Dawson for 12 yards to the 22. Three plays later, Davis caught Bono's pass in the end zone for a 14-0 lead.

When the Redskins got the ball on the Chiefs' 45 with 9:57 to play, Frerotte threw four incomplete passes and was replaced on the next series by Shuler, who lost his job to Frerotte after getting hurt in the season opener.

The Chiefs held Washington to 79 yards rushing.

The Redskins played without injured receivers Henry Ellard and Michael Westbrook. In addition, guard Tre Johnson, who came back after missing five of the last seven games, went out in the second half with a strained knee.

Tackle Joe Phillips, thriving in the Chiefs' new attack defense, pressured Frerotte into an incompletion on a third down play after the Redskins had driven to the Kansas City 12 in the second quarter. Eddie Murray then kicked a 29-yard field goal.

ELECTION

Fitzwater backs Powell, Dole

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

Marlin Fitzwater, former White House press secretary, announced his support for Colin Powell as president or vice president.

"I think he would be a good president and would be qualified," Fitzwater said.

Fitzwater, who was at K-State promoting his book, "Call the Briefing!" said he offered Powell, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, assistance with a presidential or vice presidential campaign.

"I told him I would help," he said.

Usually, young people work 24 hours a day on political campaigns, but he offered Powell his help if he wanted a balding, old guy to lend a hand, Fitzwater said.

Another option for Powell is running as vice president to gain some more political experience, Fitzwater said.

"I also urged Powell to be vice president with Dole," Fitzwater said. "I think that would be a good ticket."

A strong ticket, like the Dole-Powell ticket, will be important in the next presidential election, he said.

"Most scenarios favor the re-election of Clinton," Fitzwater said.

H. Ross Perot, an independent candidate, will probably run again, and third parties adversely affect the Republican party, he said.

In addition to the threat of a third party running, Fitzwater said Clinton is good at running campaigns.

"He is a better campaigner than governor," he said.

"That's another reason I think the party should encourage a Dole-Powell ticket."

However Powell decides to run, he should do well, Fitzwater said.

"He wins either way, probably," Fitzwater said.

During a book-signing session,

Fitzwater spoke with K-State alumni and students about his book.

"Call the Briefing!" discusses Fitzwater's life leading up to and in Washington, D.C.

Fitzwater grew up in Abilene and studied journalism at K-State.

"The journalism training itself helped prepare me," Fitzwater said. "At that time, the journalism school was a close-knit family. My journalism professors helped out a lot after graduation."

He said his involvement in his fraternity, Delta Tau Delta, also had an effect on his life.

"I made friends who I still have today," Fitzwater said.

Jonathan Butters, sophomore in business administration, said his high-school teacher was Fitzwater's college roommate and often talked about him in class.

"I thought it was kind of neat to talk to him after hearing Mr. Rafield talk about him and all the things he's done," Butters said.

"It's nice to know he is normal and you can talk to him."

Tim Bannwarth, sophomore in business, had his copy of the book autographed by Fitzwater.

"I love reading about politics," Bannwarth said. "Plus, he worked under Reagan and Bush, and I admired those two presidents."

Bannwarth said he thought it was neat that Fitzwater stopped in Manhattan on his book tour.

"I think it's cool he knows where he came from," he said. "He didn't forget his roots and what helped him to get where he is today."

Fitzwater said growing up in the Midwest, where people have good values and know what is important in life, provided him with a strong base for the East Coast political scene.

"People here are more secure," Fitzwater said. "Growing up in vast spaces teaches people to be self-reliant and secure. I wouldn't trade my background for the world."

K-STATE AMBASSADORS

Representatives ready to recruit

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

Two new K-State Ambassadors were announced during halftime activities at Saturday's Homecoming game.

K-State students voted for Matt Urbanek, junior in economics, and Mariah Tanner, junior in consumer/family economics, to represent K-State next year.

Ambassadors

are chosen because of their enthusiasm, knowledge of the University and communication skills, said Becky Klingler, director of constituent affairs and adviser to the ambassadors.

The new K-State ambassadors will attend alumni functions across the state, be involved in student recruitment and serve as the University's student body representatives when needed, Klingler said.

"It should start getting busy soon, and I look forward to that," Urbanek said. "I'm excited about talking about K-State."

Tanner said she wanted to make being an ambassador her first priority, along with school.

"Right now, things are slow, but it will start to pick up — especially next fall. I'll definitely have to plan ahead and manage my time well," she said.

Tanner said she hoped to bring in the best students to K-State and keep alumni informed and excited about the University.

"I also hope to represent the student body as best I can and maintain its standards of excellence," she said.

Urbanek said he hoped to be a voice for the students on campus, those who have left and those yet to come.

Urbanek ran for ambassador last year and made it to the finals.

"I was really excited because I had the opportunity to be slated last year, and I knew how everything worked," he said.

"So I didn't really get nervous until I looked up and saw all the purple in the stands."

Urbanek said he wanted to be an ambassador because he enjoyed meeting new students.

"I really like what the position does, as far as meeting new students and trying to convince them to come and have as great of an experience as I've had at K-State," he said.

Tanner said her decision to run for K-State ambassador was helped by support from friends.

"I had so much fun meeting new people and promoting K-State, but it was also due to suggestions from other people," she said.

"If I never had the support of all the people, I probably wouldn't have done it, but it was the right thing for me."

All of the candidates that ran for ambassador this year were qualified, Klingler said.

"I think all five were very, very sincere and articulate," she said. "Any of them would have done a great job."

COST

Everett said she does not think students spend too much money for Homecoming.

"I do not think it is out of hand," she said.

Homecoming is an important time for the University to show respect for alumni, she said.

Chris Martin, sophomore in mechanical engineering and Goodnow Hall president, said the amount spent by each residence hall varied from hall to hall and year to year for Homecoming.

"It is the hall governing boards who allocate the money," he said.

Goodnow was allocated $600 for Homecoming and only spent $400, he said.

"It promotes a lot of spirit for the residence halls," he said. "So spending the money goes for a good cause."

Smurthwaite Scholarship House spent $628 for its float, $25 for its spirit banner and $20 for sweatshirts, said Cassandra Taylor, sophomore in architecture and Homecoming co-chair.

Homecoming is a worthwhile way to spend the money for Smurthwaite, said Hesper Thompson, sophomore in animal science and pre-veterinary medicine and publicity and Homecoming co-chair.

"Homecoming is an important tradition here at K-State," she said.

Students have mixed responses about spending a large amount of money for Homecoming to show school pride.

"When it comes to a matter of pride, yes, it is worth the cost," Doug Walsh, senior in agribusiness and Alpha Gamma Rho member, said.

Bernie Haney, junior in mass communications and Beta Theta Pi member, said that from his house's view, it could use the money in other places.

"I think it is a waste of money," he said.

Spending a lot of money for Homecoming is part of the atmosphere, Ryan Crowell, freshman in art and Haymaker resident, said.

"You have got to spend money on more than just academics," he said.

There are worse things students could spend their money on, said Tara Dickerson, sophomore in international business and Chi Omega member.

"I think it is a great way to show greek spirit through Homecoming," she said.

Mark Ford, junior in mechanical engineering and Smith Scholarship House member, said the greek system spent too much money for Homecoming.

"For us, we just do not have the money to spend," he said.

There are limits set for the greeks, yet everyone goes over, he said.

"It does not do any good to have rules on spending and not enforce them," he said.

Drew Green, junior in biology and pre-medicine and Pi Kappa Phi member, said some of the money could be used for charities.

"All the houses talk about raising money for their philanthropies," he said.

"Yet they spend more money on Homecoming."

The reason for this is you get more public relations for Homecoming than a philanthropy, he said.

Limits of stage hinder dance show

Dan Lewerenz
Collegian

Patrons of Wamego's Columbian Theatre found themselves journeying across North America Saturday night as the Great American Indian Dancers presented "Rediscovering the Native American."

Unfortunately, limited time and space forced the performers to cut short many of their stops, providing the audience merely a taste of the culture they had come to sample.

The Great American Indian Dancers performed snippets of traditional dances from more than a dozen tribes — from the Kiowa of the Southern Plains to the Eskimos of Alaska. Narrated by Shoshana Wasserman, a Creek/Seminole, the dancers combined traditional powwow dances with storytelling dances and song.

But more often than not, logistics got in the way of the performance.

Perhaps the most difficult obstacle to overcome was the stage. Most, if not all, of the traditional dances were meant to be performed in the round, circling the drums.

But the size and shape of a stage and the concentration of the audience on one side of the performers, forced the dancers to redirect their performances. The drum was off to one side, while the dancing moved as much side-to-side as around.

Furthermore, the position of the audience below the level of the stage resulted in a poor view of the dancing, which is usually viewed from the same level or above in an arena-like setting.

The size of the troupe also affected its ability to recreate authentic dances. Four men and three women simply cannot produce the same effect as an arena full of dancers.

A perfect example of this was the men's northern plains grass dance. Usually performed by dozens of participants, the fringe on the dancer's costumes moves and sways like tall grass on the plains.

The Great American Indian Dancers had one man perform the dance. While he was a very good dancer alone, he was nothing more than that — a good dancer. He could not recreate the motion of the prairie.

The troupe was occasionally able to overcome the limits of the stage, even turn them into an advantage.

When performing Oyate-Chan-Gleska, a Sioux hoop dance, which is always a crowd favorite, the technicians dimmed the stage lights.

The dancers used glow-in-the-dark hoops to bring to life the forms of their dance.

Later, the speed and brilliance of the men's fancy dancing was exaggerated by once again playing with lighting.

Saturday night was certainly no pow wow. But neither was it Bobby and Cindy Brady getting Indian names in the Grand Canyon.

Those more familiar with American Indian music and dance were probably bored by the format, which emphasized showing short samples of many tribal dances without a complete showing.

But the diversity of cultures represented and the informative narration provided the uninitiated with an entertaining evening they will probably never forget.

NEAK Frasty

11 schools stomp in stepshow

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

The Alpha Phi Alpha Inc.'s fifth-annual Neak Frasty '95 stepshow in Bramlage Coliseum was packed tight with people Saturday night waiting to see the stepshow and R&B group Soul for Real.

I liked the stepshow. It was really long, but this was only because there were 11 groups that stepped.

Some people complained about the length of the show. A break between the sororities' and fraternities' performances would have given people a chance to stretch and eat without missing anything.

Even though the show was long, master of ceremonies Billy Williams, sophomore in art and member of Alpha Phi Alpha, kept the ball rolling with his deep, soft voice. He got plenty of laughs from the audience with his off-the-wall jokes.

Four sororities competed at the show. They were Delta Sigma Theta of K-State; Alpha Kappa Alpha of K-State; Alpha Kappa Alpha of the University of Missouri; and Zeta Phi Beta of Iowa State University.

The seven fraternities that participated in the show were Phi Beta Sigma of K-State; Phi Beta Sigma of Iowa State; Alpha Phi Alpha from Missouri; Omega Psi Phi of K-State; Omega Psi Phi of Emporia State; Kappa Alpha Psi of the University of Kansas; and Phi Beta Sigma of Missouri.

The stepshow started with the sultry, husky voice of Raichon Hiltz, sophomore in pre-health professions program and member of Alpha Phi Alpha at K-State, singing the national anthem. His dynamic voice made the already standing audience clap madly with appreciation.

The steppin' kicked off with the ladies of K-State's Alpha Kappa Alpha chapter. They definitely had the crowd hyped with their fast-paced routine and enthusiasm. They certainly got the show rolling and set the pace for the show.

Everyone did a good job and put a lot of effort into the routines, but there were some that stood out from the others.

The Phi Beta Sigmas from Iowa State were original. They started off on a slow note but gave it a funny twist at the end. I do have to give them credit for participating with only three people.

They were original because at the end of their routine, they played Michael Jackson's "Beat It," and they each put on the famous one glove that Jackson wore. They had the audience rolling with laughter.

Another group that caught the audience's attention was Alpha Phi Alpha of Missouri.

They were creative because they came on stage with boxing outfits on. They had a ring girl who walked across the stage with a sign announcing each round, coaches who wiped the sweat from their foreheads between each round and a referee.

The performance of the Omega Psi Phis of Emporia State will be remembered by many for the reason they had to be removed from stage. Some of the members started stripping down to their boxer shorts, and one of the men had his penis slip out. He was removed from the stage.

It was not clear if it happened intentionally or accidentally, but the crowd went crazy. The last member of the Omega Psi Phi preceded to grind the stage before he exited.

Their behavior was inappropriate for the stepshow, especially for the simple fact that there were children present. Williams apologized to the audience.

The stepshow was successful because the participants looked good. At the risk of bragging, it should be said that the men and women of K-State put forth a lot of effort, and it showed.

It was evident K-State was in the house because K-State chapters Delta Sigma Theta and Omega Psi Phi both took first place.

Soul for Real put on a great performance. Many people did not get to see the group perform because they left during the hour and a half delay before its show.

Soul for Real was greeted by thunderous applause and screaming fans. But this mood was lost because of technical difficulties — the sound system was horrible because each time the group started to sing, a loud crackling noise was heard.

Members of the group told the crowd they wanted to stop and start over when the equipment was fixed, but many audience members started booing and demanding their money back.

This was in poor taste for members of the audience to react by booing. It was not Soul for Real's fault the equipment was bad. I would not have blamed them if they had decided not to play at all, but the people who waited did get a treat.

I was informed that the technical problem was caused by the microphones Soul for Real was using. The show was rescued because the old microphones were replaced with new microphones from the football complex.

Despite some of the difficulties the show faced, overall, the show was good. Hopefully the Alpha Phi Alphas will use these problems to their benefit in planning future events.

Obie Austin, senior in nursing at Missouri Western State College, leads members of Alpha Phi Alpha through a dance during the Neak Frasty stepshow Saturday night. Austin's fraternity was competing for a $1,000 prize.

Soul for Real brothers delay college for singing career

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

There is definitely "soul" in the R&B group Soul for Real.

They are four brothers from New York who came from a family with financial problems, but they have managed to stick together and push their way to the top. Soul for Real performed Saturday night at Alpha Phi Alpha Inc.'s Neak Frasty '95 stepshow.

"We are still struggling," said Kim Dalyrimple, the group's road manager and sister. "Just because the group is known, that does not mean that we are rich."

"The story about Soul for Real is like rags to riches. We didn't grow up poor — more like a middle-class family."

"We started to have financial problems like everybody runs into," Dalyrimple said. "We were down-and-out, and this was their only way out. This is what they turned to to try to make it out of the ghetto."

Soul for Real has released one album, "Candy Rain", which has gone platinum, Dalyrimple said. A platinum is an album that has sold at least one million units.

The album's single, "Every Little Thing I Do," went gold after it sold 500,000 copies.

Speaking to the members of Soul for Real on a one-to-one basis, it becomes clear the group is not just a bunch of empty heads counting on their voices for paychecks for the rest of their lives. They are intelligent men who have goals.

The oldest member of the group is 24-year-old Chris Dalyrimple, nicknamed "Choc."

He said he would like to go to college and study engineering but has temporarily put his education aside to focus on his singing career.

"Presently, I'm not in school, but I planned on going back to school when I graduated, but right now I'm at a critical moment in my career so I had to put it off," he said.

Chris Dalyrimple said he considered himself an average teen-ager, even though he is a celebrity.

The youngest member of the group is 15-year-old Jason Dalyrimple, nicknamed "Chace."

He said he wanted to go to college because he wants to go into producing and acting.

The third member of the group is 19-year-old Brian Dalyrimple, or "Bri." He said he wanted to go to college because he wants to act, produce and do anything else he can get his hands on.

He said the encouragement to pursue a career in entertainment came from within the group.

"Basically, me and my brothers told ourselves individually and collectively that we have talent, and we know that we can sing and there is nothing that anyone can do or say that can stop us from coming out," Brian Dalyrimple said.

He said the brothers have been singing together all their lives but they have been a group for about three years.

Brian Dalyrimple said he enjoyed being a singer.

"I love it," he said. "I love seeing the providers the Union contracts with will depend on what kind of deal the Union can negotiate with companies and the space constraints.

Pitts said he recommended this hybrid proposal because the Union's in-house food services weren't generating enough revenue to cover their overhead.

The Union hopes outside contractors will bring in the additional revenue required to cover these expenses.

The revenue earned could be used for other non-revenue-generating services provided by the Union, Pitts said.

The food services recommendations would create many changes within the structure of the Union.

"We are talking about a potential situation for the loss of staff," he said.

Pitts said several variables would play roles in the extent of the changes, but at this time, the extent of employment changes was unknown.

"We want to be able to offer alternatives and assistance to our employees," Pitts said.

Student workers from the hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics department who work for Union food services for class credit should not be affected by the proposed changes.

"The Union will continue to recognize our role in education. We will continue looking at ideas that will allow us to support the educational mission," Pitts said.

Pitts also recommended the Union contract with a local vendors to operate a convenience store within the Union.

"A convenience store would increase the ability and purchasing power, impact the staffing level and possibly expand the food-mix variety," Pitts said.

This will not affect the Union Bookstore in any way because there is a duplication in products between the bookstore and the information booth.

Pitts' recommendations would separate the information booth from food services.

Pitts said he wanted to separate these functions because information flow is becoming more critical as the campus grows.

"Students who are looking for XYZ building don't want to stand in line behind someone ordering 10 bags of popcorn," Pitts said. "Information and food is not a good marriage."

Pitts recommended the Union vending program remain as a self-operational unit.

Pitts has been Union director since Oct. 1.

He said he based his recommendations from information gathered and proposed by parts of the food service staff, the Union senior administrative staff, the three-year Union financial plan and the proposals from the consulting firms Cornyn-Fasano and RICCA Associates.

BOEING

Release of fumes injures 117

Associated Press

UBURN, Wash. — Investigators probably won't know what caused a toxic release at the Boeing Co.'s fabrication division until sometime next week, a company spokesman said Saturday.

"We're still working on trying to determine what made it happen," division spokesman Tom Koehler said. "We know what happened but not why it happened."

The corrosive gas release sent an acid plume about 200 feet into the air, and 117 people were taken to area hospitals — most with minor injuries.

The release of the noxious fumes happened at mid-morning Friday, when two Boeing supervisors were pumping about 300 gallons of mixed nitric and hydrofluoric acid from a tank in the 17-68 Building to a portable tank for transportation to an on-site waste-treatment site, Koehler said.

The supervisors were filling in for striking Machinists.

The two employees handling the chemical transfer were men in their mid-30s with 10 to 15 years of experience, said Peter Conte, a Boeing fabrications spokesman. Both wore all the required protective gear, including respirators, and neither was among those taken to hospitals, Conte added.

Boeing declined to identify the supervisors who were transferring the chemicals, pending the investigation.

Machinists Union lead negotiator Bob Gregory said the incident raised serious concerns about the safety and quality of work being performed by Boeing during the strike, which began Oct. 6.

"We very much hope that Boeing is not assigning unqualified and untrained people to perform work that could endanger the public or the Boeing employees inside the plants," Gregory told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer Friday.

The acid, used as a cleaning agent in an area where spare parts for airplanes are made, might have come into contact with metal inside the portable tank, causing a chemical reaction, said Ronald Groff, a Boeing safety manager.

The interior of the tanks is lined with a plastic-type material. The acid might have found its way past the protective lining, Boeing officials said.

Koehler said the incident was the first of its kind at the Auburn facility.

"We are a very large facility with a lot of equipment and machinery," Koehler said Saturday. "We have concerns that we address daily, but nothing quite like that."

Investigators from the state Department of Labor and Industries were at the fabrication division Saturday, Koehler said. It was going to be closed through the weekend, but Koehler said it would reopen on today.

"It's going to be business as usual," he said.

All of those who received medical attention came into contact with the highly toxic chemical outside the plant, Koehler said.

Harrison said.

The Tau Beta Pi chapter will present the modified toys to the Assistive Technology Center at its initiation banquet the night before Christmas break.

Harrison said he had the switches that hook into the headphone jack and a pair of switches that were compatible for the child with a toy. The switch that a child will receive is determined by the physical characteristics.

"It's always great to have an organization to donate their time," Harrison said. "It's such a tremendous service to the parents."

Guenther said helping children gave him a good feeling.

"You're doing something that actually has meaning," Guenther said.

MALL

looking to remarket the bonds is because of the good economy and low interest rates.

By being able to remarket the bonds, Forest City is escaping the put option that Lennar Northeast Partnership, the current bond holder, could exercise in 1997.

This option would allow Lennar to force Forest City to pay the bonds off immediately. Forest City would have the option of paying the bonds back or finding another buyer for the bonds.

If Forest City decided not to pay the bonds back, Lennar could foreclose on the mall. With no management system, the mall would be owned by the bond owner, which could potentially close the mall down.

Forest City is in the process of purchasing the mall bonds from Lennar and remarketing them.

The remarketing agents, BC Christopher Co. and Crews and Associates, are going to attempt to find investors for the bonds.

"A lot of these investors are people like you and me," Wood said.

If remarketing is unsuccessful, mall owners would go back to the pre-marketing situation, Wood said. They would continue to make interest payments on the current bonds and face the potential put option in 1997.

The commission is scheduled to consider final approval of the mall agreement at its Nov. 21 meeting.

said he would not attend because of security concerns. He was likely discouraged by Israel from joining the mourners for fear his presence, still highly controversial in Israel, would set off protests.

According to Jewish tradition, burial should take place by the next sunset, but the prime minister's funeral was delayed a day to allow world leaders to attend.

Rabin, a former army chief, will be buried with full military honors in the section of the Mount Herzl cemetery reserved for prime ministers and other national leaders. The coffin will be brought from parliament, where it has been lying in state.

Between 5,000 and 6,000 people will attend the main service on the esplanade in front of the tomb of Theodor Herzl, founder of the Zionist movement and visionary of the modern Jewish state.

A much smaller number, about 500 high-ranking dignitaries from Israel and abroad, and members of the Rabin family, will be present at the burial.

tion. "Right now, I would say, Israel is 40-percent right-wing, 40 percent left-wing and 20-percent in the middle," he said.

The most shocking part of Rabin's death that will cause political unrest was that he was killed by one of his own people, Margalit said.

"The one that killed him wasn't among enemies. He was a Jew," Margalit said.

This is the first time in the history of Israel that a Jewish person has killed a Jewish leader, he said.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, who was with Rabin at the rally and only yards away when the shots were fired, assumed the leadership of the government.

Peres, who shared the 1994 Nobel Peace Prize with Rabin and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, has been firmly committed to the Mideast peace process.

By law, when a prime minister dies in office, the government is deemed to have resigned and becomes a transitional government.

The president, Ezer Weizman, must begin contacts on the formation of a new government.

Margalit said it was hard to say what will happen in Israel, but he said Israel was a democratic regime and the idea of peace would continue.

"When you kill a person, you don't kill the idea," he said.

IMPEACHMENT

Senate chair withdraws legislation

Cristina Janney
city-government editor

The Student Senate chair withdrew his impeachment legislation against an arts and sciences senator Monday after that senator said he was going to resign.

John Potter, Senate chair, said he withdrew his name from the bill because Michael Henry, art and sciences senator, said he intended to resign at the Senate meeting Thursday.

Henry would not give reasons for his planned resignation but said he would explain the reasons for his resignation at the meeting Thursday.

Henry was a member of the student body president's cabinet his freshman year, served as an intern and has been a senator for three years.

Potter wrote the bill of impeachment because Henry had three unexcused absences from Senate meetings. According to Student Governing Association By-Laws, that is grounds for impeachment.

Potter announced Henry's planned resignation at a Senate Operations Committee meeting.

The committee also received Student Tribunal's written interpretation of the SGA By-Laws and Constitution concerning the role of the committee and Senate in the impeachment process.

Potter requested an interpretation of the SGA Constitution and By-laws after the committee failed to bring impeachment charges against Henry.

The committee keeps Senate attendance records and is supposed to hold a hearing to determine if impeachment legislation should be written if a senator has more than three unexcused absences.

The committee reviewed Henry's case and decided one of his absences should have been excused. It voted not to sponsor impeachment legislation against Henry.

Tribunal said the role of the committee and Senate should be to only evaluate the existence of evidence in supporting the bill of impeachment rather than the validity, merit or weight of the evidence.

It is Tribunal's job to try an impeachment case and make a decision on whether to remove a senator.

Tribunal said students being considered for impeachment should be notified by a certified method that their case is being heard and given the right to speak at hearings.

Tribunal also suggested Senate revise the by-laws to eliminate some conflicts with the constitution.

Battery charges against Gaskins dismissed

Dan Lowerenz
sports editor

Charges against K-State linebacker Percell Gaskins stemming from the Aug. 20 assault in the 1600 block of Leavenworth were dropped Monday.

Gaskins attorney had filed a motion to dismiss last week after taking affidavits from four witnesses stating Gaskins' was in the training room and taking part in drills at the time of the assault.

"We have received some information that indicates that the defendant may be innocent and may not have been at the scene of the crime," Assistant Riley County Attorney Barry Wilkerson said.

"Therefore, we ask to dismiss the matter," he said.

Gaskins had no comment about the finding.

The case against K-State defensive end Nyle Wren was continued until 1 p.m. Nov. 20.

According to police reports, Wren was identified by one of the victims the morning of the assault and one other witness who was in the house.

When questioned, Coach Bill Snyder said he had called a team meeting after the incident and Wren, quarterback Brian Kavanagh, offensive lineman Mike Munson and wide receivers Andre Anderson and Tyson Schwiager came forward and said they were involved.

When questioned by police, Wren said he and others became angry upon hearing of the fight involving defensive end Matt McEwen and wide receiver Mitch Running the night before.

Wren said he and several other men, who he would not identify, went back to the scene for some "payback." Wren said he and another man broke in the front door and entered the home. He said about eight-10 men were involved in the incident but would not identify any of the others.

K-State student to appear on Nashville Network

Swinging her hips and moving to the country beat is just something that comes naturally to K-State student Amy Wilson.

So natural, in fact, that Wilson, senior in elementary education, will appear on the Nashville Network today from 4:30 to 5:30 p.m. as part of the First Annual Wildhorse Saloon Dance Contest.

"It's just something I just started doing, and it's something I can do," said Wilson.

Wilson started line dancing about two years ago while going out with her parents in Kansas City. She has competed in swing dancing before, but this was the first time she competed in a line dancing contest.

Her father told her about the contest after listening to an announcement on KFKF 94.1 FM, a country station in Kansas City.

Wilson competed in the open competition, the regional semifinals and the regional finals to become the regional finalist and qualify for the First Annual Wildhorse Saloon Dance Contest.

Along with 21 other regional finalists, Wilson was given an all-expense paid trip to Nashville to the national finals. The competition took place from Oct. 14 to Oct. 18.

"It was just an honor to be there," said Wilson.

The contestants were divided into groups of seven women that each performed the "Tush Push."

Each dancer was judged for creativity, style and technique.

"You have the same beats, but you add creative variations," Wilson said.

During her trip, Wilson toured Nashville with her mother and visited Opryland and Music Row.

There was also a party for contestants at the Wildhorse Saloon in Nashville.

"It was just exciting to be there because they treated us totally first class all the way," Wilson said.

Although she usually dances in Kansas City, Wilson goes out and dances with her sister and friends at TW Longhorn's in Manhattan.

Her sister, Amber Wilson, freshman in animal science, goes out dancing with her sister a couple times a week.

"I was really proud of her. I think she really deserved it. She's an awesome dancer. I just thought she'd do that someday," Wilson said.

Christi Marchant, senior in art education, said she also goes out dancing with Wilson about once a week.

"I think the most fun part is watching her on television," Marchant said.

Wilson said she plans to compete in another contest from Nov. 17 to Nov. 19 in St. Louis.

No rest for slain Israeli prime minister

Rabin

Associated Press

JERUSALEM — The slain prime minister had lain in the ground for little more than an hour Monday when Israelis broke into a graveside shouting match about his peace policies.

The fight started after the dignitaries, police and cameras had left, and the cemetery opened to the public. Hundreds swarmed to the wreath-covered grave to lay bouquets and light candles.

A white sign with black letters announced that Yitzhak Rabin, son of Nehimiya and Rosa, lay buried under the hundreds of flowers. A soldier read from the Book of Psalms, and the crowd joined in to say Amen.

But shouts soon drowned out the prayers after one man reportedly said that the assassin should also have killed Rabin's successor, Shimon Peres.

Others yelled about the impropriety of the dispute and called for unity after Rabin's death. Fourteen-year-old Revital Rosen burst into tears.

"I want peace, but how can we reach it when we only fight among ourselves," she asked. "One man told me that Peres will sell us out."

"Utopianists, leftists," someone behind her said.

Yigal Amir, who confessed to shooting Rabin Saturday night, said he acted because the prime minister planned to give land back to the Arabs.

Officials blame right-wing slogans that called Rabin a traitor and posters that pictured him in Nazi uniform for creating the atmosphere that led to the shooting.

Hilik Atayas, a youth leader from the religious right-wing Bnei Akiva movement, said he regretted the campaign.

"We should beg forgiveness for what we did," Atayas said. "We saw the writing on the wall and didn't say anything until they killed him."

The shouting over Rabin's fresh grave was a reminder that the autonomy agreements with the Palestinians have aroused heated emotions readily manipulated by extremists.

But for the most part, Rabin was treated as a hero by those who came to the cemetery.

Lawmakers, U.S. officials, friends and family shed tears as they placed small stones or handfuls of earth on the grave in Jewish custom.

Rabin's longtime driver, Nehemiya Shirabi, bent sobbing over the newly turned earth. Jordan's King Hussein blinked profusely as the military cantor chanted a traditional mourning prayer.

Later, three teen-age girls from Jerusalem sat by the graveside writing notes to Rabin. Other youths lit candles at his grave.

"My heart hurt when he was killed, so I had to come," 19-year-old Ronen Suliman said.

Shlomo Lahat, who organized Saturday's rally where Rabin was shot after singing peace songs with about 100,000 joyous supporters, stood solemn before the grave.

"He was having a good time and didn't want to leave," Lahat said. "He suddenly realized he was loved."

Commission: Waste site to stay put

Riley County commissioners voted 2-1 not to proceed with a proposal to relocate a 10-county, household hazardous waste site to south Manhattan.

Commissioners voted on the item despite its absence from the agenda.

The proposal would have entailed a portable unit being set up for a household hazardous wastes at 10th Street and Fort Riley Boulevard, across the street from Howie's Recycling Inc.

The motion to vote against the proposal occurred when commissioners were discussing meeting minutes.

"The only reason the vote was taken was because it came up at the previous week's meeting and came up during the minutes," Commissioner Russ Frey said.

Frey said the commission didn't have to have items on its agenda in order to vote on them.

"That's not the way our agenda has been set up," Frey said.

He said he wouldn't argue that it probably wouldn't have hurt to have had the item on the agenda before the commission voted.

Commissioner Jim Williams refused to comment on the phone about the meeting.

K-State Student Union food service employees said they were not surprised by recommendations made Friday by the Union director to eliminate in-house food service.

The recommendations included contracting out for traditional food services, such as the Stateroom cafeteria, catering, Union Station and Bluemont Buffet.

Bernard Pitts, Union director, also recommended the Union pursue the branding concept. This would mean contracting with fast food franchises as part of the Union enhancement program.

The proposed changes could result in the 27 full-time Union food services' employees and 200 student employees losing their jobs.

Malley Sisson, food service director, said employees have had time to digest the possibility of outside contracting over the past year.

"We knew last October that food service might

ROYAL PURPLE, COLLEGIAN RECEIVE NATIONAL MEDIA AWARDS

Students from the Student Publications Inc. received several awards at the National College Media Advisers Convention this past weekend in Washington, D.C.

Student members of the Associated Collegiate Press submitted work for the competition from newspapers and yearbooks across the nation.

Photographer Craig Hacker, sophomore undecided, took second place in the feature photo category. Hacker, who entered a photo of Chad May surrounded by children waiting for an autograph, said it was his first national competition of this kind.

Aaron Graham, Spring 1995 graduate, received first place for his entry in the College Media Advisers Best Advertising Campaign category.

Todd Fleischer, Spring 1995 graduate, was awarded the ACP and Adobe College Designer of the Year for yearbooks.

K-State's Royal Purple received the ACP Pacemaker for its 1994 book and the ACP Best of Show for its 1995 edition.

Sarah Kallenbach, sophomore in mass communications and editor of the 1996 Royal Purple, said she is extremely proud of the Royal Purple's accomplishments.

"Receiving the Pacemaker is a high, high honor," Kallenbach said. "The staff worked extremely hard to create a yearbook that was balanced in all areas."

Royal Purple adviser Linda Puntney said she hopes to continue the tradition of the yearbook for K-State.

"Our goal is not to win awards each year," Puntney said. "We want to create the best possible yearbook for the students, because they are the ones we create it for."

In addition, the Electronic Collegian took first in editorial content for the ACP On-line Newspaper Contest.

Ron Johnson, Collegian adviser and immediate-past president of College Media Advisers, said the E-Collegian is thought of very highly on the Internet.

MAN GETS DEATH SENTENCE FOR BEATING, BURYING VICTIM ALIVE

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — A man was sentenced to death Monday for kidnapping a 16-year-old girl, beating her with a shovel and burying her alive in a slaying prosecutors said was retribution for a drug ripoff by her brothers.

Orlando Hall, 24, of El Dorado, Ark., was convicted in one of the first cases to be brought under the 1994 Crime Bill.

The law added kidnapping resulting in death to the list of federal crimes punishable by death.

He also could have received a life sentence with no parole.

Hall was one of five men charged with kidnapping and killing Lisa Rene, who was raped during a two-day period and buried in a shallow grave in Pine Bluff, Ark.

She was dragged from her Arlington home in 1994. In a chilling plea captured on tape, Rene screamed in terror and begged a 911 operator for help as men claiming to be FBI agents broke into her apartment.

Hall was convicted Tuesday. Three co-defendants pleaded guilty and testified against him in exchange for leniency when they are sentenced.

The fifth man, Bruce Webster, 22, of Pine Bluff, goes on trial March 4.

The men had gone to the apartment in search of the girl's two brothers, whom they had paid $5,000 for marijuana that wasn't delivered. When the brothers weren't there, they took Rene. The jury recommended the death penalty after about 10 hours of deliberations.

U.S. District Judge Terry R. Means then sentenced Hall to lethal injection.

GOP WANTS RETROACTIVE TAX

WASHINGTON (AP)

— Some leading congressional Republicans want to make the $500-per-child tax cut that's a cornerstone of the "Contract With America" retroactive to 1995. If it became law, taxpayers would receive at least a partial benefit when they file returns early in the election year.

Legislation passed by the House and Senate calls for making the tax break effective Jan. 1, 1996.

But Republican leaders in both houses have discussed the possibility of pushing back the effective date all the way to Jan. 1, 1995.

For example, an Oct. 1, 1995, effective date is under discussion.

"I'd like to do it, but I've got to look at the entire package," House Majority Leader Dick Armey said recently, reflecting a widespread concern that the change may be too expensive to fit into the GOP balanced-budget legislation.

CONGRESS AVOIDS DEBT LIMIT

WASHINGTON (AP)

— The government indefinitely postponed $31.5 billion in borrowing Monday, avoiding violation of the federal debt limit but raising new talk of the first default in the nation's history.

House Republican Leader Dick Armey of Texas said Congress would raise the limit this week. But the issue is deeply tangled with the dispute between Congress and President Clinton about federal spending, making the long-range outcome less certain.

Wall Street was wary.

Historic default on U.S. debt repayment is a very major threat, said economist Elliott Platt of Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corp. in New York, though he also forecast that late this week or early next week, there will be some sort of agreement on a temporary debt limit increase.

Library funding questioned

■ Using equipment fee for computers, furniture in library under fire from students

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

Using engineering student equipment fees to pay for computers and furniture in a new Department of Engineering library may not be as easy as Dean of Engineering Don Rathbone thinks.

The new library, which begins construction late next spring will be funded by a $2 million donation from Alice Fiedler in the name of her husband who graduated from the K-State engineering school, Rathbone said.

Rathbone also said Fiedler told him an additional $2 million would be given to the Department of Engineering to maintain the library.

But the computers, laser printers, software, tables, chairs, shelves and a main server within the library will not be paid for by the donation.

Instead, the library furnishing and equipment will be funded by student equipment fees, Rathbone said.

Engineering students are charged $100 each semester in student equipment fees. The students are required to pay for new equipment and the maintenance of the equipment used in the engineering departments, Ken Gowdy, associate dean of engineering, said.

The fees raise about $300,000 each semester for the College of Engineering, Gowdy said.

The equipment fee is set up to provide 40 percent for use at the discretion of the dean of the College of Engineering, Rathbone said.

Rathbone said he wants to use $115,000 of his share of the fee per year for three years to fund equipment in the new library totaling about 20 percent of the total equipment fee each year for the next three years.

Using the equipment fee for supplies in the future library is a bad idea, Jon Hilton, senior in mechanical engineering, said.

"He wants to put in computers and desks and chairs. That to me is not lab equipment. I don't even know if the fee is necessary if he wants to use it on the library," Hilton said.

Instead, the equipment fee should be used to update existing engineering labs, Hilton said.

"I think it's wrong because I don't think the labs are what they should be," Hilton said.

Hilton organized a petition for students who are opposed to using equipment fees for the library. He said he has about 250 signatures but has only spent a few days working on the petition.

Rathbone proposed the idea at an open engineering forum at the beginning of the semester. Those attending were asked if they were in favor of the plan by a show of hands, Jonathan Beall, president of Engineering Council, said.

Most, if not all, of the people present were in favor of the plan, Beall said.

"The dean has, as a leader, gone to the students and to the faculty. He has created an atmosphere of information sharing and input," Beall said.

However, Hilton said Rathbone's proposal was not on the engineering forum agenda and students were not given enough time to gather all of the facts before making a decision.

And only about 50 engineering students attended the meeting, Hilton said.

"I think the problem is most people didn't know anything about it, and that troubles me a lot," Hilton said.

Rathbone said every group he has talked to is in favor of using the fee for the library, and those that are against the plan probably do not understand how the money will be used.

Rathbone also said he is willing to meet with any group to answer any questions it has and discuss the issue.

Hilton said about 50 percent of the people he has talked to are against the use of their fees being used in the library.

A task force has been formed to look into the opinions of students and staff about the use of the equipment fee, Rathbone said.

The task force is made up of a representative from each engineering department, a student representative from the Engineering Student Council and Rathbone.

The committee has about two months to finalize its decision as to whether to use the equipment fee, Rathbone said.

Hilton said he would rather see the equipment fee used to fund repairs and improvements in current engineering equipment labs.

The labs are checked by a national accreditation team at least every six years, Gowdy said.

Rathbone said the national accreditation team examined the labs and found the labs met criteria in some departments and exceeded criteria in other departments.

If the student equipment fee is used to fund supplies in the new engineering library, students will only be contributing a modest amount to what will be a tremendous addition to the College of Engineering, Rathbone said.

"We're only going to build this library once, so let's do this as well as we can and that's why I want the students to participate. I don't want just a cement block building. I want quality. One that students will be proud of for 50 years," Rathbone said.

But students should be allowed to decide whether their the money should go to the library, Hilton said.

Justin Salmans, senior in industrial engineering, said the fee should be used for computers but not for furniture.

"I understand furniture is going to be a one-time thing, but I don't think it's equipment," Salmans said.

Salmans also said some departments' labs are not as good as they should be. He said the chemical engineering labs need new software, printers and faster computers.

Rathbone will meet with engineering students at an engineering forum at 7 p.m. Thursday in Durland 173.

The forum will allow students to express concerns and learn more about the use of the equipment fee for the library, Beall said.

► CITY COMMISSION

TDM may get incentives

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

The city commission will decide tonight if it will approve $1.24 million in incentives for Troy Design and Manufacturing Co.

The $1.24 million is a portion of the $2 million needed to bring the TDM vehicle natural-gas-conversion facility to Manhattan.

The natural-gas-conversion facility will join the electric-vehicle plant TDM plans to build in Manhattan.

The money, if approved by the city commission, will deplete the city's economic development fund of all its money for the rest of the calendar year.

"Our incentive package calls for a $975,000 grant in job incentives and a loan of $270,000," said Dale Stinson, director of economic development for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

"That is the remaining money for the rest of this calendar year," Stinson said.

The remaining $800,000 needed to bring in the natural-gas-conversion facility will be provided through private funds, Stinson said.

Originally, TDM had talks with Ford Motor Co. to locate the natural-gas-conversion facility near Ford's Claycomo, Mo., plant.

After TDM established Manhattan as the future site of an electric-vehicle-production plant, area groups looked into what it would take to bring the natural-gas-conversion facility to Manhattan.

If the city commission votes to allocate the money to TDM, the plant will expand from 40,000 to 60,000 square feet. The plant will contain facilities for both electric-vehicle production and natural-gas conversion.

"It makes sense to put the two facilities together, rather than have them be separate," Randy Martin, Chamber of Commerce president, said.

The addition of natural-gas conversion at the TDM plant will also increase the number of jobs at the plant.

"The new facility will bring more than 60-plus jobs over the next couple of years," Martin said. "Those jobs will average $30,000 to $40,000 a year."

► FORENSICS

Student qualifies for tournament

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

The blood bath of forensics competition has begun, and one of K-State's juniors has joined the ranks of students competing nationally.

Jeni Pruitt, who has competed in forensics for three years, was recently the first K-State Forensics Team member to qualify for the American Forensics Association National Individual Events Tournament beginning the first weekend of April in Gainesville, Fla.

"It's one big bloodbath," Pruitt, junior in mass communications, said.

"Only around the top 10 percent of the people who compete get to go."

"I compete in informal speaking, impromptu speaking and communication analysis," she said.

"By the end of the year, I will have added persuasive speech and after dinner."

K-State is one of nearly 300 teams that competes for a chance to go to the national tournament.

"I was excited when I qualified," Pruitt said.

"It's great to be able to go, but just being happy to be there won't take you very far."

Pruitt said she attributes much of her success to having the chance to be around other people on the team.

"We had three national champions when I was a freshman," Pruitt said. "It was kind of scary, but I was able to learn from the best."

The national tournament is a week-long event that begins with three preliminary rounds and ends with the top people from each group facing off.

"You have to have the right attitude," Pruitt said. "I want to compete to make it to the final rounds."

"The forensics team as a whole has had a bit of an up and down season," she said.

Craig Brown, coach for the forensics team, said he is happy with the progress the team has made.

"We started out pretty slow, but in the last three tournaments we've done a lot better," he said.

K-State had 16 individuals make it into the finals of one tournament and 14 in another, Brown said.

Brown is trying to prepare for the national tournament by increasing the competition for the K-State team.

"We're trying to hit better tournaments," he said. "It helps that we have a lot of good teams in the area."

Brown said the reason for the success of the forensics team comes from a combination of three things.

"We have great kids coming out of high school in Kansas, there's a great tradition here and the support from President Jon Wefald and the arts and sciences department has been outstanding," Brown said.

Union enhancement depends on student input

The success of the Union enhancement project has been its ability to incorporate student input.

Monday's announcement that the K-State Student Union might contract out its food services probably shocked K-Staters. But we think they will be pleasantly surprised.

Union expansion has made new opportunities possible. The original plans called for a new food court with at least four brand-name franchises.

The latest proposal calls for a possible combination of contracted food service in the Stateroom, Union Station, Bluemont Room and Union Catering and bringing in brand-name food distributors.

What does this mean for the student? The jury is still out. But more than likely, it will mean lower prices, better selection and more student jobs.

All of that makes the $23 per semester Union enhancement fee seem more bearable and increases the likelihood of the Union eventually becoming self-sufficient.

It is regrettable that some Union food service employees might lose their jobs as a result of the change.

But the net result of these changes should be more options for less money — if you play your part.

The success of the Union enhancement project has been its ability to incorporate student input.

Ultimately, students will determine whether this change makes or breaks the Union. If we don't like the people who come in, they won't make any money.

As a result, students must maintain their end of the dialogue by participating in the evaluation of potential vendors. Students must help choose the brand-name restaurants that come into the food court. Students must ensure these companies hire students.

It's up to you to make this work.

Powell's image buckles under close scrutiny

Everybody's talking about Colin Powell — about whether he will, should or could run for president.

Sunday's New York Times said, "Hype aside, Powell has more potential than any modern politician to be a transformative figure." It makes me wonder if that writer knows what "hype aside" means.

We need to cut the crap, right now. Powell is, by all reports, a very competent military commander and the kind of guy everybody wants to see succeed.

He is NOT a mythic figure, destined to save America. His immense popularity is due to three things:

1.) Powell has some pretty sharp (and highly paid, no doubt) publicity people.

Gasp! It's true. He and his publishers have put a fair amount of money into making Powell popular, and it looks like they are getting a good return on their investment.

After all, there were other military commanders involved with the Gulf War, and you don't hear anyone speculating about whether they are going to run for president.

2.) Our media institutions suck. We're talking about newspapers like USA Today that are so news-stupid they can insert five references to the O.J. Simpson trial in the opening paragraphs of an article about mass graves found in Bosnia.

The sorts of journalists who control national news have a knack for actually creating news, in the same way CNN was an important factor in causing the Los Angeles riots after the Rodney King trial.

3.) People really, really want to vote for a hero, and I don't mean just a military hero.

I'm talking about the self-made-man, unblemished-record kind of a hero.

There aren't any people like that in politics right now, because there aren't any people like that. Everybody has some sort of skeleton in the closet, and if Powell runs, his will come tumbling out.

But it hasn't yet, and Powell is the closest thing to hero we've seen on the political scene in a long time.

Nobody is saying Powell should be president just because he's a nice guy, are they? Here's some of the things that are being said:

Tom Brokaw said Powell might help engender a "new civility" in national politics. "He would add dignity," Brokaw said in the New York Times.

Well, A.) it won't happen that way, as anyone who knows the politics of Bob Dole should know, and B.) bringing dignity to politics, while a noble goal, is not a primary concern of the president.

Another article about Powell in Sunday's New York Times (there were several) cited people who feel a Powell candidacy would help shift politics away from ideology and more towards personality.

What's weird is they made it sound like a good thing.

Oh, great — our last president who was big on personality was Ronald Reagan.

He had so much personality that he could destroy the livelihood of small-time family farmers with a smile, and have them turn right around and vote for him.

Perhaps it's unfair to compare a competent military man to an ancient actor with Alzheimer's disease — perhaps.

Yet another news article in Sunday's New York Times alleged, in a positive tone, Powell is a "true believer in Ronald Reagan."

I don't think our country can afford another Ronald Reagan at this point. Republicans and Democrats alike are stressing the need to balance the budget and eliminate the national debt, and as far as debt goes, Reagan is the undisputed king.

Reagan preached a balanced budget, too, while expanding the deficit more than any president ever. Reagan did to the national deficit what Lyndon Johnson did to Vietnam.

Lots of people would dispute the idea that Powell would be a Reagan rerun.

But remember how Powell became famous — it was the Gulf War that did it, a particularly imperialist example of Reaganology.

Also, the New York Times reports that Dan Quayle is one of the leading Republicans trying to get Powell to run.

That's right, Dan Quayle (He probably just wants another shot at the vice-presidency, hee hee.)

I'm afraid some people will claim anyone who opposes Powell is some sort of racist and just doesn't want a black man in the White House.

I, on the contrary, would love to see a black man as president. I think it would do wonders for our country.

But that man isn't Colin Powell. That man is Jesse Jackson, or someone like him.

He should be someone who we know, someone who knows public policy, someone who has a vision of a better America.

He should be someone who has a record of helping people, as Jackson does, instead of a record of killing people in other countries, as Powell does (100,000 Iraqis buried alive in their trenches sound familiar?).

Let Powell run for Congress, like Ollie North, another Reaganologist. Then we will all get a chance to see just what manner of man he is.

PUBLICLY FINANCED ELECTIONS
Serve democracy

It is quite a shame that we can't live in a truly democratic country.

Today money is the determining factor in whether a candidate gets elected and not their appeal to voters.

This sets up a system where the common man's voice can never be heard. Moneyed interests are the only ones that have the ear of the politicians.

The reason for this is not that all politicians are money-grubbing scum bags. It has more to do with the cost of getting elected.

For instance, say a fairly idealistic candidate were to be elected to congress. They have many great plans and intend to fight hard for their side. But they know in two years they will face another election battle costing a lot of money.

Now say one day they receive nine calls from citizens with legitimate interest and one call from a political action committee. The PAC can give them $5,000 dollars. They only have time to return one call and the election looms in front of them. Which call do you suppose they will return?

The fact is that even ethical politicians, of which there are few, will feel the pressure of fund raising. They will have to learn to give up some things to fight the battles that are most important to them.

This points to the need for drastic campaign finance reform at all levels.

Now some may say campaigns are already regulated well enough. Individuals can donate no more than $1,000 dollars to candidates and PACs no more than $5,000.

There is no limit on soft money, which goes directly to political parties and not the candidates. This money is given to candidates by the party, often with a lot of winking going on.

In addition, there is nothing that prevents certain rich individuals from producing and running their own ads for particular candidates. As long as there is no official contact with the campaign, individuals can spend as much money as they want this way.

The solution to all of this would be publicly financed elections.

Of course, certain problems leap immediately to mind. From a legal standpoint, the most important would be the Supreme Court's 1976 Buckley vs. Valeo decision. This makes it impossible to require a candidate to take public financing. Therefore it would have to be voluntary.

Now what would cause a candidate to take public financing if they knew they could raise much more privately. For one, make it highly publicized so the candidate failed to take the public funds.

► SEPARATIST GROUPS

Editor,

In response to the opinion of Kady Guyton on these "separatist groups," there needs to be some reality applied. I do not feel the comparison of a terrorist act with special-interest groups is a fair one. Why do we have these groups showing up all the time?

A long time ago there was a government that thought it could exercise control over the people. The people who got tired of it formed a "separatist group." They left to practice something called religious freedom in another place.

They were a bad group. They hated government control and often spoke against their government. This group even declared itself independent. They would even fight for their freedom from government oppression. These rebels won a war and called themselves Americans. They formed a government of the people.

It took forever. These separatist groups kept showing up. They voiced opinions and published papers that made it hard for the new government plan to become effective. The groups said they would not support the new plan unless it had some provision to protect the people from the government. A Bill of Rights was added to the plan, and a Constitution was passed.

History has shown that Americans hate to get screwed by the government.

Americans form groups that speak against the government. They can do this because of the influence early groups had on the importance of the Bill of Rights.

The First Amendment of the Constitution clearly states you can form a group, tell the government to go to hell and publish it.

These groups need to exist in order to represent the views of all the people. They are not terrorists.

An example of the actions these groups take is the election last fall when Congress was voted out. The National Rifle Association does not have enough members to vote a turn over in Congress; some other people had to vote with them.

The average education level of the members in these groups is probably lower than a college degree. Most of the people are in blue-collar positions.

They are also mostly veterans while most of their peers, that are now in government, went to college. The others went to fight a war. The ones that served know the power that government can have over people.

Special-interest groups, or separatists, are part of our history. They are a voice of many people. Expressing disagreement with the government is only American.

These groups are not terrorist, and their actions are not criminal. They are for less government control.

A prime example they use is the government's control over the Second Amendment. This is just one of the many freedoms that we are losing.

Nestled between Fairchild and Nichols halls is K-State's center for cultural events. Friday, McCain Auditorium will celebrate its 25th anniversary in conjunction with the Carolyn James opera concert.

"We hope to give people the opportunity to walk in parts of the building that they never get to see," Richard Martin, director of McCain, said. The current McCain building replaced the University Auditorium, which was constructed in 1904.

"The old auditorium was in wretched shape," Jean Sloop, professor of voice and singers' diction, said.

"The building had steam heat with radiators, and it tended to make noises during the performances."

She said the night watchman would have to go up to the balcony to punch in his time clock and his footsteps could be heard throughout the auditorium when he got there during performances. A separate tin roof also existed above the stage and rattled in the wind.

"The chairs were thin-molded plywood seats, which, in time, splintered," Sloop said.

"People would have to bring pillows with them to the performances to sit on," Martin agreed.

The building was in bad condition. "The auditorium had, in essence, been condemned for years," he said.

"At various points the University administration had taken action to begin plans for a new auditorium." The Kansas State legislature actually had $680,000 set aside for the purpose of constructing a new facility when they decided to build a chicken house instead, Sloop said.

A number of the students were upset with the state of the auditorium and would scatter cement on the floor so people would think the ceiling was falling, Sloop said.

On Jan. 15, 1965, a couple of students decided to take matters into their own hands.

"The ringleader of the fire was the concert master of the orchestra," Sloop said. "When caught, he admitted to it and said somebody had to do it."

According to an article in the Feb. 18, 1965, issue of the Manhattan Mercury, K-State students Larry Saylor and William Shaw were convicted with second degree arson for the burning of the University Auditorium. Saylor pled guilty while Shaw was convicted of the crime.

The building of the new auditorium had several obstacles to overcome, Sloop said.

McCain rests on an alluvial soil, which in essence is like an underground river, she said. To support the new structure, 197 post holes were needed, and the contracted construction company did not have a hydraulic drill to dig through the soil, Sloop said.

"It was somewhere between one-and-a-half to two years behind," she said. "On the day it was originally supposed to be dedicated, they dug the last post hole."

Consequently, every other portion of the project was delayed.

"All the sub-contractors were in town with nothing to do but sit in Aggieville at Kites, drink beer and get paid by the day," Sloop said.

Once the post holes had been dug and the construction was underway, two music professors, Warren Walker and Paul Shull, made it their business to be on the site everyday and look over the foreman's shoulder to make sure things were being done correctly, Sloop said.

"It's a good thing, too," she said.

"One day Paul Shull asked where the conduit was for the communication line between the sound booth and the stage."

It turned out there was no conduit, Sloop said. Construction stopped while Shull, who had an undergraduate engineering degree, went to the architect's office and had it changed.

"That's how close we came to no communication between the sound booth and the stage," Sloop said.

She also said there was a great deal of controversy among architects about the movable ceiling in McCain, but it was decided to implement the ceiling.

"We don't change it that much," Sloop said. "Occasionally, we lower it for chamber music."

Five years after being burned to the ground, the new auditorium was ready to be dedicated Nov. 11, 1970.

At the dedication, the Minneapolis Orchestra, K-State chorus, soloists and a narrator performed an original piece written especially for the dedication, Sloop said. Ray Malland, a Hollywood actor, narrated "A Record of Our Time" composed by visiting professor Gail Kubik.

Ralph Titus, emeritus professor in extension communications, was a good friend of the late Kubik and said some people did not think the piece was appropriate for the dedication of McCain.

"It's a big oratorio, and it's based on Mark Twain's 'War Prayer,'" Titus said. "There wasn't a great deal of controversy, but there was some."

He said a local radio show had an editorial about the performance, and Kubik had a chance to defend it on the air. The controversy that did surround the composition had a lot to do with the Vietnam War, Titus said.

The chorus chanted some slogans heard around the country at the time demonstrating the existing racial tension, Titus said. The somewhat dissonant music and underlying anti-war theme also did not sit well with some of those in attendance, he said.

Kubik grew up in Coffeyville as a music prodigy and was a renowned national and international composer, Titus said.

"He was the youngest, at the time,

Deion allows Cowboys to dominate San Francisco

Well, it's finally here. The biggest game of the 1995 NFL season has arrived. Don't worry, football junkies, you'll get your first dose of the Super Bowl this weekend.

It's the two best teams in the NFL, the Dallas Cowboys against the San Francisco 49ers.

For the past three years, the 49ers and Cowboys have been right where everyone has expected them to be, battling for the NFC championship. The winner of those three games has gone on, not only to win the Super Bowl, but to make their opponents look plain silly.

Once again this year, everyone expects the 49ers and Cowboys to meet in January. And, as it was the previous three years, it will make the Super Bowl that follows more anticlimactic. That's what happens when two teams are in a league completely of their own.

Even 49er President Carmen Policy feels the 49er-Cowboy match up is more satisfying than the Super Bowl. When asked if beating Dallas in last season's championship game was more satisfying than beating the Chargers in the Super Bowl, Policy said, "The rush we got beating Dallas was just unmatched in terms of any victory we had during the regular or postseason."

And as it has been for the past two years, this regular season match up between these two giants could determine who receives home-field advantage throughout the playoffs.

All of this has led the 49ers-Cowboys match up to be one of the hottest rivalries in the NFL. There is a sturdy foundation in the root of this rivalry. It has five of the best players in the NFL right now: Jerry Rice and Steve Young with San Francisco; Troy Aikman, Emmitt Smith and Michael Irvin in Dallas.

But this year, there is a new log on the fire.

Deion Sanders.

The 49ers are out to prove they don't need Sanders to win another Super Bowl. The Cowboys said they are now the team on top with the addition of all-pro cornerback Deion Sanders.

I have to agree with the Cowboys' statement.

Before Dallas even landed Sanders, it had one of the best defenses in the NFL. Its only weakness was the secondary. When you put Sanders in your secondary, you automatically become one of the best defenses against the pass.

Sanders is about the only defensive back who can completely take away one side of the field. Quarterbacks are simply scared to throw to his side. And Sanders is the only defensive back who I think can shut down Jerry Rice for a game.

But Sanders isn't the only reason why the Cowboys will beat the 49ers Sunday. Sanders or no Sanders, the Cowboys don't win without the big trio. I'm referring to Troy Aikman, Emmitt Smith and Michael Irvin.

The men in the big trio are arguably the best at their positions this year. You can already seal the deal on Smith taking MVP honors this year, with Aikman a close second.

The 49ers are stumbling coming into their first outdoor road game of the season. The 49ers have already been dealt losses by the Lions, Colts, Saints and Panthers. Yes, the expansion Carolina Panthers beat the Super Bowl Champions in Candlestick Park. This is the first expansion team to ever beat a Super Bowl champion.

Part of the 49ers' failures can be attributed to injuries. This year, the 49ers have lost tight end Brent Jones, quarterback Steve Young and fullback William Floyd. Young should be back for the game against the Cowboys, but he will be rusty. The rustiness of Young and the lack of blocking from a banged up offensive line and departure of Floyd will spell bad news for 49er fans. The Dallas defensive front should have a field day on Young and the rest of the 49ers offense.

On the other side of the ball, expect Emmitt Smith to get his usual 100 yards and a touchdown. Also expect Troy Aikman to connect with Michael Irvin against the very weak secondary of San Francisco.

My prediction:

Even though the 49ers are not looking anything like the Super Bowl champions they are, they will play very competitively because of the rivalry. That's the only reason the 49ers don't get blown out in the first mini-Super Bowl.

Cowboys 34 49ers 24.

▶ The K-State athletic department and Ott Food Products Company have teamed up to "Pock the Place" at Wednesday night's K-State vs. Kansas volleyball match.

About 300 free tickets are still available at the reception area of Bramlage Coliseum, assistant athletic director Cindy Fox said.

K-State students with a valid ID are admitted free to all Wildcat home volleyball matches.

Ott Food Products Company will be giving out "Lick KU" suckers to the first 5,000 fans in attendance. There will be other drawings and giveaways as well.

K-State club to play in Texas

■ Lacrosse team placed second in last year's Shootout at A&M

Lisa Elliot
staff writer

K-State's lacrosse team is gearing up for its second appearance in the Lacrosse Shootout at Texas A&M this weekend.

"We went down there for the first time last year," Whit Plunkett, club vice president, said.

The team placed second in the tournament last year, and its goalie was named defensive player of the tournament, he said. The team lost 5-4 in the championship game to Southwest Texas University.

"We were in the finals, and we lost by one goal or two goals," Brian Frownfelter, defensive player, said. "But we had a chance to win."

Frownfelter said the team has been practicing Tuesdays, Thursdays, Saturdays, Sundays and some Fridays in preparation for the tournament.

"We've had two games this fall," Plunkett said.

"We played Kansas City, and we had a purple and white scrimmage."

The team beat Kansas City 13-12.

Plunkett, a junior in marketing, has been playing lacrosse for six years. He started playing when he was a freshman in high school in Boston.

"It's pretty big back there," he said.

Plunkett said he stumbled on K-State's team when he overheard two guys talking about the lacrosse team at a party.

"I just happened to come across it," he said.

Since he had played in the East Coast, he was a shoe-in for the team, he said.

Frownfelter, senior in landscape architecture, also discovered the team by word of mouth.

He met the coach and one of the players in the K-State Student Union during fall 1991. Frownfelter, who is in his fifth season with the team, said he played in high school.

But experience is not required for team membership.

"We teach people how to play," Plunkett said.

Frownfelter agreed. Anyone who wants to join can join the lacrosse club team.

"It's mostly just a walk on," he said.

In fact, the games the club has played this fall were to prepare the team rookies for the Shootout at Texas A&M, Plunkett said.

"This past week, we've been working hard on basic skills," Jason Ford, attack man, said.

Ford was one of the walk-ons five years ago. Ford said he and a friend bought lacrosse sticks while they were at a seventh grade hockey camp, but he did not play seriously until he came to K-State.

Last spring and summer, Ford, fifth-year architecture student, played in an adult league in Florida.

"Now we're getting a lot of guys who have played in high school," he said.

Besides practice, the team also has classroom time where the plays are learned and then walked through on the field.

"We usually go through all of our plays and set ups during practice," Frownfelter said.

Plunkett said about 32 teams compete in the tournament. The teams are divided into two brackets — the experienced teams and the novice teams. Last year K-State played in the novice bracket because the team had not been to the tournament before.

"We're hoping to play in the upper bracket," Plunkett said.

"We had a pretty good tournament last year, so I don't see why not."

Teams in the upper bracket included the Bud Light All-

Americans and the Minnesota All-Americans, he said.

"We're all psyched up because we were there last year," Frownfelter said.

Ford also played with the team last year. He said he thought the team was in awe of the tournament.

"It's a really, really large tournament," Ford said. "We know what to expect this year. We know we can win."

The normal season is in the spring. Most of the games in the fall are tournament games in the Midwest.

Cleveland Browns are moving to Baltimore

Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Two weeks ago, this city was glowing with pride as the Indians played in the World Series for the first time in 41 years.

Monday, Browns owner Art Modell made it official — his football team is leaving town for Baltimore.

The same fans who cheered for the Indians weren't handing out popularity prizes to Modell, whose franchise once was the only bright spot in the city's sporting calendar.

"I think he's a sneak and a coward," said Joe Simone, 41, of Cleveland, a Browns season ticket holder for 23 years.

Simone was upset Modell had imposed a season-long moratorium on discussions of renovating Cleveland Stadium but had ignored his own rule to talk with Baltimore.

"Art did say we had until the end of this year before he would do anything," Simone said. "He placed a moratorium on any talk about moving the team, but yet during his moratorium, he was dealing with Baltimore. I don't think that's right."

The city hasn't given up — community leaders continued to argue for passage Tuesday of a ballot issue that would extend the county sin tax on alcohol and tobacco products to help pay for renovation of Cleveland Stadium.

"We as a community need to show that we did everything in our power to keep our 49-year-old football team home," Cuyahoga County Commissioner Lee Weingart said Monday.

The sin tax is central to two of the city's hopes for keeping the Browns: convincing the NFL to block the move or persuading team owner Art Modell to stay.

A third option, a legal challenge, is already under way.

Under the NFL's rules, an owner wanting to move a team must prove the host city is inhospitable, and show the host city is unwilling to help improve the situation.

It's a slim hope. Twice this year, the league has failed to block a determined owner from moving.

But the NFL may be Cleveland's best hope for now. NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue Monday sent Mayor Michael R. White a letter lending his strong support to the sin tax extension.

"Obviously, this funding is critical to establishing a state-of-the-art facility and the future of professional football in Cleveland," Tagliabue said.

The vote also affects whether Cleveland can go to Modell Wednesday with any kind of package to complete with Maryland's offer.

But it's unclear how Modell might receive such an offer, since Maryland Gov. Parris Glendening said Monday that Modell had committed himself to a financially binding contract.

The first round of the city's legal challenge to the move met with limited success Monday.

A judge granted the city's request for an order temporarily blocking the Browns from leaving town, but left open the door for the team to announce their intention to leave.

Minutes later, the team issued a news release confirming its plans to move.

Regina White, 33, of Cleveland, watched televised coverage of Monday's news conference in Baltimore as Modell announced his plans.

"If he thinks someone's going to beg him to stay here in Cleveland, I'm not. The people of Cleveland should just tell him to go ahead on," White said.

- Annie Gallup will perform at 8:30 tonight at Espresso Royale Caffe. Gallup is a singer and songwriter from Seattle. She is touring in support of her latest release "Cause and Effect."
- Soprano Carolyn James, a Manhattan native, will sing the music of Mozart, Barber, Schubert, and Richard Strauss at 8 p.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium.

REVIEW

Exhibit illustrates new works of art, free interpretation

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

"Mindscapes," the latest art exhibit at the Strecker Gallery, depicts, for the most part, how the thought process of artists figure into their work.

Not to say there are artists working in the world today who don't think, but the work in Mindscapes is directly related to subjective thoughts. Abstract thoughts and memories are used for work or the work's foundations.

Most impressive in the exhibit is the photographic montages of Jerry Uelsmann.

Uelsmann's black-and-white, surrealist photography warrants close inspection.

Minute details in shadows or reflections take on great significance and help clarify meanings.

"I believe that almost anything you can think of is worth trying," Uelsmann said.

Some subjects of Uelsmann's work are an English drawing room with a ceiling open to reveal sky, a female nude hovering over a seashore or a fragment of Grecian sculpture set in a scene of nature.

The only complaint in there is not enough of Uelsmann's work on display. That can be attributed to his immense popularity. He wasn't on hand at the exhibit opening because he was in Manhattan, New York.

Uelsmann has been working in photography since the 1950s. He is now a graduate research professor of art at the University of Florida. His work has been exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art (New York), The National Museum of Modern Art (Kyoto, Japan) and has been the subject of several books.

Sally Thomas, a native of Manhattan, maintains the theme of thoughts and personal experiences in her tiny, limited-color, mixed-media pieces.

Thomas used just about everything under the sun when she created her very textural work, including pieces of cloth, number impressions and sewing.

"A Nightmare Present," mixed-media on paper, presents you with bound figures, supposedly human mummies, in the lower two-thirds of the piece. The upper third consists of a free-spirited animal leaping across the frame.

Perhaps it is a comment of how humans are bound by their own laws. By contrast, animals have no constraints and therefore enjoy a richer life.

Thomas won't argue the merits of various interpretations, because no definite one exists.

"The animal could mean energy or life. But animals are also a destructive force," Thomas said of the piece.

"I don't like to say because I like the viewer to bring their own interpretation to it," Thomas said.

"One of the purposes of art is to make people think. If you say too much you're taking something away from the viewer's interpretation," she said.

The final and third artist is Dan Kirchhefer, a native of Emporia, whose female nude drawings and simple images were the subject of a complete exhibit and gallery talk last year in the Willard Gallery.

to win the Pulitzer Prize in music," he said.

Kubik composed the music for "The Desperate Hours" starring Humphrey Bogart and "Memphis Belle" directed Dancer-choreographer

David Parsons

by William Wyler in addition to numerous concerto pieces.

"He ended up spending nearly 20 years in Europe," Titus said.

"He was much better known over there."

"A Record of Our Time" was performed only one other time, Titus said. The Los Angeles Symphony conducted by Roger Wagner played the composition with Roscoe Lee Jones narrating.

Despite some of the audience members' response to the piece, those actually performing at the dedication were pleased with the new auditorium.

"They were so impressed by the acoustics that three members of the Minneapolis Orchestra came to the music office and asked if there were any positions open,"

Sloop said, laughing.

In addition to the musical performance, James McCain, president of the University at the time, officially dedicated the new University Auditorium for the enrichment of the University community and the entire state.

In April 1975, Governor Robert Bennett officially renamed University Auditorium for President McCain, according to an article in the April 21, 1975, Collegian.

Over the past 25 years, there have been five directors of McCain and a wide variety of performances, Martin said.

"In a program that has 16 to 17 performances a year, you don't see too much of the same thing," he said.

Musicians like Helen Reddy, Victor Borge, Mel Torme and the Smithsonian Jazz Masterworks Orchestra have performed on stage in McCain.

"I'm proud of the chamber music we have had," Martin said.

The St. Louis Symphony, Vienna Choir Boys and Czech State Orchestra are a few of the groups performing classical music that have entertained McCain audience members.

Titus said cellist Yo Yo Ma and violinist Itzhak Perlman stand out in his mind as excellent performances. He also said he enjoyed listening to opera bass Samuel Ramey.

"He is now the most recorded bass in opera history," Titus said.

The first time the Lincoln Center Opera came to town stands out in Sloop's mind, she said.

"They were enchanted by our facilities, and a gentleman in town threw a midnight champagne supper for the entire double cast, orchestra and everyone on the bus," Sloop said.

The young performers were so impressed by the dinner, they changed their schedule for the next year so they could come back here, she said.

A number of dancers like the Principal Dancers of the New York City Ballet, Alvin Ailey American Dance Theatre and the Susan Marshall Dancers have performed on McCain's stage.

In addition, a number of well-known stage productions and operas, such as "Madame Butterfly" and "Don Giovanni," have been performed.

Acts like the Chinese Acrobats and David Copperfield have also entertained local audiences in McCain.

The new auditorium had a lot to do with getting those people here, Sloop said.

"With our facilities, we can provide the kind of space and environment attractive to visiting artists," Sloop said.

In addition to visiting performers, many student groups use McCain's stage for their productions and concerts, Martin said.

"It's a multipurpose facility," he said. "We've had bodybuilding competitions, FFA conventions and Boys' State activities in here."

Martin said the facility also helps attract and keep some of the faculty here and gives students a chance to experience different cultural events.

"It's a part of the mix I think it is very important for students to have," Martin said.

"Many students come to K-State from small high schools. We give them a chance to experience this for a fairly low cost."

Martin said it is important to preserve the facilities and quality of programs coming to McCain for future audience members.

"We need to preserve this for the people who come after we're gone," he said. "I think it makes campus a more interesting place."

► ASSASSINATION

Leaders pay respect to Rabin

Clinton stresses peace at funeral of slain leader

Associated Press

JERUSALEM — President Clinton bid farewell Monday to Yitzhak Rabin, confident his spirit lives on, and urged the assassinated prime minister's followers and critics to curb their rhetoric or risk deeper rifts in this torn society.

Joining with Arab, European and Israeli leaders, Clinton eulogized Rabin at his burial as an inspiration who laid down his life to secure Israel's future by making peace with the Palestinians.

"Now it falls to all of us who love peace, and all of us who loved him, to carry on the struggle to which he gave his life," Clinton said in a raspy voice.

He wound up the tribute reciting in flawless Hebrew the last words of the Kaddish, the Jewish prayer for the dead.

Clinton noted that Jews this week are reading the biblical account of patriarch Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son, Yitzhak, in obedience to the Lord's command.

"Now, God tests our faith even more terribly, for he has taken our Yitzhak," the president said.

Then, Clinton passed an hour with Ezer Weizman, the Israeli president whose political influence belies a largely ceremonial office, and went on to meetings with Shimon Peres, the acting prime minister, and two Arab leaders who have made peace with Israel, King Hussein of Jordan and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt.

Clinton is seeking their support to try to unlock the Israeli-Syrian peace talks, suspended since June, and to keep Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization on a track leading to negotiations next year over so-called final issues, including Jerusalem's future.

"the Knesset, in your homes, in your places of worship, stay the righteous course"

PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON

But in a period of mourning, Clinton did not focus on details and did not think it would be appropriate to try to sound them out, U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk said.

He said Clinton did receive a commitment, however, from Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of the opposition Likud coalition, that Likud would support the Mideast peace process.

Rabin's murder raised concern for Clinton about the kind of environment in which a rhetoric of hatred seeps into the debate and becomes seen, at least by extremists, as acceptable, the ambassador said.

Mindful that a foe of Rabin's territorial concessions is the assassin and that risks are implicit in the accords, Clinton focused on polarization as a pitfall of democracies, Israeli and American.

"Your prime minister was a martyr for peace, but he was a victim of hate," Clinton said in his eulogy. "Surely we must learn from his martyrdom that if people cannot let go of the hatred of their enemies, they risk sowing the seeds of hatred among themselves," he said.

"I ask you, the people of Israel, on behalf of my nation that knows its own long litany of loss from Abraham Lincoln to President Kennedy to Martin Luther King, to not let that happen to you. In the Knesset, in your homes, in your places of worship, stay the righteous course," Clinton said.

While surveying Israeli attitudes and bolstering morale, Clinton referred to the unprecedented delegation of two former presidents, George Bush and Jimmy Carter, and two former secretaries of state, Cyrus R. Vance and George Shultz.

This was the first time an incumbent president attended a foreign leader's funeral accompanied by former presidents.

The U.S. delegation also had 44 members of Congress and prominent American Jews, including Orthodox rabbi Hershel Lookstein and Elie Wiesel, the Nobel Peace Prize winner.

In Washington, the Senate approved a resolution honoring Rabin, saying his entire life was dedicated to the cause of peace and security for Israel and its people.

The resolution condemned the assassination and expressed support for the Israeli government.

The funeral ceremony brought together leaders of Russia, Germany and other powerful nations, but small ones as well, Lithuania and Albania, for instance.

"Look at the leaders from all over the Middle East and around the world who have journeyed here today for Yitzhak Rabin and for peace," Clinton said.

"Our prime minister was a martyr for peace, but he was a victim of hate"

PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON

Notable in their absence were Yasser Arafat, the chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which was given control of most of the West Bank by the Rabin-Peres government, and Syrian President Hafez Assad.

Arafat was said to be uncertain of security in Jerusalem, while Assad's Syria is technically still at war with Israel.

However, White House spokesman Mike McCurry said Assad condemned Rabin's murder in a telephone conversation Saturday evening with Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

► RABIN

Assassin says he acted alone, denies rumors of conspiracy

Associated Press

TEL AVIV, Israel — Yitzhak Rabin's confessed assassin told a judge Monday he made a coldhearted decision to kill the prime minister to stop the peace process.

Police were investigating whether Yigal Amir and his older brother were part of a right-wing conspiracy.

Magistrate Dan Arbel ordered Amir, 25, held for 15 days as the investigation continued. His 27-year-old brother, Hagai Amir, who admitted giving Yigal 20 bullets of the type used to shoot Rabin, was ordered held for seven days.

Unshaven and clad in the same clothes and skullcap he wore when he fired the fatal shots Saturday night, Yigal Amir told the judge he drew his ideas from the Halacha — the Jewish legal code.

"According to the Halacha, you can kill the enemy. My whole life, I learned Halacha. When you kill in war, it is an act that is allowed."

In an even tone, Amir described the shooting. "I tried to get as close as I could," he said.

The police jumped on him and hit the pistol, causing him to hit Rabin's bodyguard, too, Amir said. The guard was slightly wounded.

"I did this to stop the peace process," he said. "We need to be cold-hearted."

Arbel asked if he acted alone.

"It was God," Amir said.

Hagai Amir said at a separate hearing that his brother had asked him several times whom he should kill to stop the Middle East peace process. He said

Yigal Amir had also reported to him his two aborted plans to assassinate Rabin.

Hagai Amir also said he had modified 20 9mm bullets to make them more accurate, by boring holes in them to insert iron pellets, and had given some to his brother. One of the bullets removed from Rabin's body was of that modified type, Israel radio quoted police as saying.

Hagai Amir denied knowing that his brother planned to kill Rabin on Saturday and said he hadn't known the bullets were intended for murder.

A police representative said investigators are trying to determine whether the brothers acted in the service of the Kahana Chai movement — an offshoot of the outlawed Kach movement founded by the late Rabbi Meir Kahane.

Hagai Amir denied any membership in radical groups, but both he and his brother are known to have connections with such groups and with far-right settlers in the West Bank.

Security sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Yigal Amir was believed to be close to the radical group Eyal.

Police have questioned several dozen known Jewish militants and are seeking to question still others who have gone into hiding.

Yigal Amir faces a maximum penalty of life in prison if convicted of the killing. The death penalty in Israel is reserved for those convicted of crimes against humanity and genocide.

Authorities said his brother, Hagai Amir, could be charged with not preventing a murder and assisting in the planning of a murder.

► CITY COMMISSION

City audit to address concerns about credibility, cash flow

Cori Cornellison
staff reporter

Auditing firms from Olathe, Manhattan, Marysville and Topeka exchanged ideas and asked questions of city commissioners at a pre-proposal conference for a city audit Monday night.

City commissioners voted Sept. 5 to hire an auditor after south-Manhattan residents questioned the spending of money from various special community development block grants and the city's urban renewal land inventory.

The residents said some of the money from the fund should have been used for economic development in their neighborhoods.

The audit will look at cash receipts and disbursements of various special community development block grants and the city's urban renewal land inventory.

Mayor Edith Stunkel said she is not interested in doing what auditors have already done in the past, and to avoid that, there must be communication.

"I think the audit itself will be one of continued dialogue," she said.

Commissioner Steve Hall said he is willing to work with auditing firms to determine an appropriate amount of time for the audit to be completed.

"I'm interested in the truth," he said. "I'm in no big rush as long as we resolve the issue."

Hall said the audit will either help or harm the city's credibility.

"If there is a point where there's no records available and you can't do anything, then that credibility will last forever," he said.

Commissioner Sydney Carlin said she is interested in finding out if the land sold in the 1970s for the urban renewal program was sold at a fair market price.

Ruby Jones, south Manhattan resident, said she expects all of the findings of the auditing firm to be included in the audit.

"Whatever is found in it, I want in it," she said. "I don't care who it hurts. I want it in it."

Commissioners set a Nov. 20 deadline for proposals. Interviews of selected firms will be scheduled at a later date.

The city missed its first Sept. 20 deadline to select an auditor because no firms submitted proposals.

► STUDENT PUBLICATIONS

Board hires ad manager, loses member

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

The Board of Student Publications hired a new advertising manager and lost a board member at its meeting Monday night.

The board promoted Trice Alford, senior in speech, from assistant advertising manager to advertising manager for the spring 1996 semester.

The vote to elect Alford sparked a debate about whether to change the advertising manager selection process.

The board agreed to continue to choose an assistant advertising manager with the intent to promote that person to manager the following semester.

However, there was dissent about whether the board should choose this person or whether advertising director Gloria Freeland should be given a say in the decision.

The assistant ad manager position was created last year.

This is the first time the process has been used in hiring.

"I feel like if I am present at interviews, then that person is more likely to heed my advice," Freeland said.

Some of the student members of the board expressed concerns about giving away the board's authority.

"I have a real problem taking the decision away from the students," Lin Bliss, secretary of the board and student, said.

The board adjourned without resolving the issue, which will probably cause the new assistant advertising manager to be hired by the board because there will not be another board meeting before the selection process begins.

In other business, the chairman of the board's personnel committee, Russ Wilson, senior in journalism and mass communications, announced his plans to resign.

"As of prior to next week's meeting, I will be resigning due to the fact that I have chosen to apply for ad staff next year," Wilson said.

Student employees of Student Publications Inc. can't serve on the board.

The board also discussed the financial report for the last month.

The board reviewed the profits and expenses for each publication and addressed related concerns.

One concern was there are not enough Collegians.

The Collegian's press run was recently reduced from 14,000 to 11,500 because of financial problems associated with high newsprint costs and low ad revenue.

"We're really running out of Collegians early. In Eisenhower Hall, if you're not there by 10:15, they're gone," William Feyerharm, faculty board member, said.

Finance chairman Ben Clouse said the limited availability was intentional.

"The main reason I wanted to cut the press run was to send the message, 'We're in trouble.' So if people complain to me, I tell them to tell their senator," Clouse said.

The Student Publications student fee will be up for review by Student Senate in the spring.

► ENGINEERING CONFERENCE

K-State professor to speak in France

James Dierking
staff reporter

A K-State professor will be the only American scientist to speak at a two-day international engineering conference beginning today in France.

"I was very honored. We work hard here, and being in Kansas we don't always get recognized," said Rodney Fox, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering.

Fox will join chemical engineers and professors from across Europe in the conference near Lyon, France, this week.

"The conference focuses on process engineering, a field that deals with things like oil refineries or any process where you change one matter into another," Fox said.

Fox's research and presentation is based on developing computer simulations of difficult chemical reactions.

"It's a new area because of the way computers have advanced. There are just so many more things you can do with them today," Fox said.

"It becomes possible to simulate what goes on without actually doing it."

Fox's computer simulations save companies and scientists time and money in research they do themselves, he said.

"If you simplify or completely skip intermediate steps, it saves a lot of money," he said.

Much of Fox's research is supported by industries such as Dow Chemical Company and the Exxon Corporation.

"It's really economy that's driving it with industry. They all have engineering staffs that are interested in these problems," Fox said.

Fox came to K-State in 1989 as a visiting professor in mathematics and joined the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering in 1990.

"It's obviously a lot of recognition that he would be chosen to do something like this," Ruth Dyer, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering, said.

Fox studied and researched in France for several years before coming to K-State.

"The work he's done in France has resulted in many connections. We've had several graduate students from France, and it's gone a lot the other way also," said Ruth Miller, assistant professor of electrical and computer engineering.

Fox's international interests have helped many K-State students to learn and gain experience in the world.

"He's very interested in helping students find out opportunities such as international travel and study," Dyer said. "He realizes the world we live in is becoming a much more global society."

Dyer said Fox's interaction with students is also a key to his success as a faculty member.

"He's very organized and presents things in a logical and easy manner so you can follow them," Dyer said.

FINE ARTS SPRING ALLOCATIONS REQUESTS

It is time for groups to submit applications for funding of events or projects for which you would like assistance from the Fine Arts Council. As you may or may not know, the Fine Arts Council was created by the Student Senate to establish more fine arts programming on campus. This money is generated from the Fine Arts privilege fee students pay each semester. A reserves account is created that assists in the programming efforts of student groups promoting fine-arts related programming.

The forms that need to be filled out are available at the OSAS Office. THE DEADLINE FOR APPLICATION IS ON OR BEFORE TUESDAY NOVEMBER 21, 1995 AT NOON (12 p.m.).

chair, said the committee would operate by Tribunal's interpretation and senators had plans to review and revise section of the constitution and by-laws for clarity.

Bill Muir, faculty representative, said he agreed with what was outlined in Tribunal's interpretation, but he said impeachment was a complex process.

"If this process was black and white, there would be no need for an operations hearing or a two-thirds vote by Senate," Muir said. "This is a more involved process."

Potter said he thought people were now more aware of the impeachment process and the Senate absence policy.

He said he thought there was confusion about the way the impeachment process works because no one had been impeached in three years.

Potter said he and the Senate parliamentarian had reviewed the absences of senators and determined there were no other senators at or more than three unexcused absences

Student Senate impeachment proceedings

Here are the two main processes for impeaching a student senator.

Proceedings on motion of a senator

Senator presents bill of impeachment.

Senate Operations Committee reviews grammar and wording of the bill.

Student Senate first readings - Questions about bill

Senate Operations Committee - Debate

1. Report favorably by majority vote

2. Report unfavorably by majority vote

3. Hold in committee (two-thirds majority of Senate can bring the bill out of committee)

Senate second readings - Debate and final action - two-thirds vote sends to Tribunal

Student Tribunal hears case and decides if senator should be removed from Senate.

Impeachment on absences

Senator Operations Committee reviews records and finds a senator who has three or more absences.

Committee determines if evidence exists to start impeachment. A majority vote would result in the committee writing and sponsoring a bill of impeachment.

Senators who had two or more unexcused absences have been notified of their absences, he said.

Potter said he thought attendance and record keeping had improved because of the review of the impeachment process.

RURAL POLITICS

Florida town full of plots, conspiracies and intrigue

Associated Press

EAGLE LAKE, Fla. — A candidate on Tuesday's city council ballot is in jail, accused of trying to bug city offices and catch the mayor in a compromising position with a prostitute.

The mayor has a bodyguard at meetings because a councilman gave him the finger.

The gavel is wielded as a weapon. "It's bizarre in any scale of politics, but it becomes even more so because this is such a small city," said Mayor Marty Kellner, taking a cigarette break with his shirt tail hanging out of his blue jeans.

Small enough, with a population of 1,900, that Big Mama's Restaurant — where regulars call the scandal "Eaglegate" — is the only eatery.

And that the alleged wiretapping and prostitution scheme, aimed at taking over city government, might have been intended eventually to do away with it.

Council candidate Walter Allen Young, 65, and businessman Earl Wayne Rice, 54, are charged with burglary, interception of oral or wire communications, and conspiracy.

Police said the two plotted to tap a phone in the city manager's office, hoping to gather dirt on city leaders.

Young, who owns apartments in town, also is accused of trying to hire a prostitute to seduce the mayor. Police say he planned to blackmail Kellner by threatening to show the photos to his wife.

To help with the scheme, Young and Rice allegedly recruited a police officer they thought was crooked, offering to make him chief of police. But the officer told his boss.

"I said, 'You're full of it. You're making this up,'" Police chief J.R. Sullivan said. "And he said, 'I'm serious. This is what they want."

Sullivan told the officer to go along with the plan, then brought in state and Polk County authorities.

The officer gave Young a phone number for what Young was told was a prostitute. She was actually a sheriff's deputy. Police say Young called and offered the woman $250 for the job.

On the night of Oct. 20, Young and the police officer allegedly broke into City Hall while Rice stood guard outside. Police listened to their conversation over the radio.

"The coast is clear. The coast is clear," Rice said as police watched and listened.

Police let them plant the telephone wiretap and leave. A few blocks away, a dozen police officers met them with lights flashing and guns drawn.

Rice, who allegedly had a loaded .38-caliber revolver in the getaway car, also faces a firearms charge.

Rice, released on $30,000 bail, refused to comment at his store, Earl's Trading Post. Young remained in jail Monday on $100,000 bail.

Young apparently hoped to get elected to the council, become mayor, then fire the city manager and disband the police department to lower taxes by having the city revert to county control.

"Nothing that goes on in Eagle Lake politics surprises us anymore," said Houss Vambers, a citrus buyer in the little bedroom community and citrus center 40 miles east of Tampa.

In the 1980s, in fact, debate became so heated that several councilmen walked off the job in the middle of a council meeting. The furor then involved attempts to balance the budget.

Politics in Eagle Lake has been simmering again ever since two newcomers were elected to the council last year, splitting votes 3-2 on most issues. The council chooses one of its own as mayor, a post Kellner has been in for six months.

In May, one council member threatened to hit another with the gavel.

In September, Kellner recruited a police officer to sit in on meetings, saying he feared for his safety after another councilman gave him the finger on the highway.

Young also has a sticky domestic situation. He got married Oct. 5, then filed for divorce the day before the City Hall break-in. The Winter Haven News Chief reported that Young proposed from jail to his estranged wife's identical twin.

WASTE

League of Women Voters at the meeting, said she was confused about why the commission voted on the waste site.

"I didn't understand what was going on, because it was not an agenda item," she said.

Frey and Williams voted to throw out the proposal.

Frey said he thinks there are bigger issues and concerns the county needs to worry about besides the relocation of the waste site.

"I think it got to be a big issue before it needed to be," Frey said. "In my opinion, it's probably best not to pursue it."

A 10-county, household hazardous waste site already exists at the county facility shop near Westloop Shopping Center.

The units used for the present waste site are two semi-trailers, said Dennis Peterson, director of noxious weed and household hazardous waste for Riley County. He said a larger facility is needed.

"We're outgrowing our facility, and we're looking for something that's a little more accessible than the county shop yard," Peterson said.

South Manhattan Neighborhood Association members opposed the proposed site at a meeting Oct. 19.

Some concerns of the neighborhood association were the proposed site was in a residential area and in close proximity to Manhattan Middle School, Wildcat Creek, Truth Park and the Douglas Center.

Peterson said a household hazardous waste site does not pose a risk when the waste is properly stored.

He said the county has not had any problems with the waste site for the five years it has been in operation.

The county's household hazardous waste program has won four awards since it started the operation, Peterson said.

Karen McCulloh, county commissioner on the recycling committee, voted to continue the proposal.

She said she thinks the county will have to find some place to relocate the waste site in the future.

McCulloh said she doesn't know where the county will propose to relocate the waste site in the future or when.

"I think there's a lot more planning that needs to be done," she said.

be contracted," Sisson said. "Over the past year, our department has been working with food consultants."

Union food service employees were involved in the decision-making process. After a year of research and exploring all options, they also recommended outside food contracting and branding concepts to increase Union income levels.

Sisson said their recommendation was financially based. If the Union could come up with an additional $1.5 million, then food services could continue self-operation, she said.

"Our people are realists. They understand we don't have the money to continue operating the way we are," she said.

Sisson said the employees and managers have been well-informed throughout the process.

Sisson said she was informed about the recommendations Friday morning. Other food service employees were informed shortly after.

She said she is confident the recommendations are not a reflection of the quality of food service, but they are financially based.

"We ran the good race, and we fought the good fight. The quality of our food services enhanced the quality of life at K-State and Manhattan, but it all comes down to a lack of money and abundance of new expectations in a restrictive environment," Sisson said.

Employees said they believed change is essential if the Union wants to continue operating and growing.

"I think this is what the students want, and this is the way we need to go for the Union. I am sad because I have enjoyed my job for the past 10 years," Flo Crain, scheduling coordinator for food services, said.

Although Crain said she is happy with her job, she is not worried about the future because the Union has given her the skills and abilities to be qualified for other jobs.

For others, it has taken time to adjust to the proposed changes.

"When all of this first came about, it was very frustrating. But since I have had time to let it soak in, I know it is time for change," Joyce Nelson, sandwich and salad-work leader, said.

During the past 22 years, Nelson said she has seen many changes in food services. She said she believed the proposed changes are too drastic, and in time, it will not keep bringing students back to the Union.

She said she is not worried about how the changes will affect her because she is considering retirement within the next year.

Some employees said they wondered what their futures would bring.

"I can't say I will stay here if the benefits are taken away. The pay is not great, but the benefits make up for it," Nancy Umscheid, multiple work leader for food services, said.

She said she hates to see personalized customer service taken away by branding and outside contracting services.

"I hope whatever they bring in will keep the students in mind," Umscheid said.

Student workers said they were not concerned with possible employment loss because outside contracting and branding might continue to employ student workers.

Adam Starcke, student manager of food services, said his job will probably not be affected because future jobs will be available for students familiar with the food industry.

He said the changes are good because the role of Union food services is to offer students what they want at a reasonable price. He said he does not believe the current food service is fulfilling that role.

Jason Erkie, senior student manager for the catering department, said the changes will be good for the Union because the facilities needed to be updated.

"We need money to upgrade our facilities. We do a great job with what we have, but what we have is old and needs replaced," he said.

The food service management will probably be most affected by the changes.

"If contract management hires within, it will be unlikely they will maintain all managers," Becky Lind, cash sales manager, said.

Lind said even though the changes are uncertain, employees have maintained a good attitude.

"Employees have done a fantastic job of staying committed to the success of food services," Lind said. "Even managers that know they may need to find other jobs are still loyally committed."

Some students not employed by food service said they believed fast food will increase the traffic flow through the Union.

Oswaldo Salum, junior in marketing, said he doesn't like the food in the Union because it does not offer variety. He thinks fast food will give students the diversity they are wanting.

Travis Niehues, junior in bakery science and management, said high prices drive him away from the Union.

"If fast food can offer a good competitive price, then student traffic in the Union would skyrocket," he said.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, will make a public announcement regarding his decision on the proposed recommendations on Friday.

► ASSAULT

Investigation continues; Gaskins remains a suspect

Dan Lewerenz
sports editor

Though charges against K-State linebacker Percell Gaskins were dropped Monday, the Riley County Police Department continues to investigate him as a suspect in the Aug. 20 assault that occurred on the 1600 block of Leavenworth.

Charges against Gaskins were dropped Monday when the Riley County attorney's office received four affidavits from witnesses testifying Gaskins was at the football complex or in the training room at the time of the assault.

But Riley County Police Director Alvin Johnson said those affidavits do not speak to his whereabouts at the exact time of the assault.

"If you look at them, you'll see that the latest the witnesses have him is 9 a.m., when the assault happened at 10 just a few blocks away," Johnson said of the affidavits.

"Most of what you see after 9 a.m. is speculation."

Football trainer John Thomas and team members Jimmy Dean, Ross Greenwood and Joe Gordon each wrote separate affidavits that said they saw Gaskins in the football training facility the morning of the assault.

"I specifically remember seeing Percell at the shuttle runs, and I personally treated him that morning at around 9 a.m. for a groin injury and a hip bruise. ... I believe that Percell was in the training room for at least an hour and probably longer because there were many players who were there to receive treatment, including Ross Greenwood and Jimmy Dean," Thomas said in his affidavit.

"... I know Percell was in the training complex receiving treatment from the trainer because I was right next to him while he was being treated. I believe it was about 9 a.m.; I don't remember the nature of his injury, but I believe he was in the training room until I left sometime after 11 a.m. that morning," Dean said in his affidavit.

... Shuttle runs were being conducted at the football complex starting at about 7:30 or 8 a.m. ... I saw Percell Gaskins at the training complex watching the shuttle runs; I believe that Percell was there encouraging players during the runs because he is a team captain; I also saw Percell in the training room being treated by John Thomas, the trainer, later that morning and I believe he was there until I left for lunch sometime around 11:15 a.m. ...," Greenwood said in his affidavit.

"I was there about to watch shuttle runs and I was also in the training room, where I saw Percell getting treatment for an injury; I know Percell was there when I got there and he was there when I left. ... Percell is a team captain and I do not believe that he had anything to do with the retaliation because I know he was in the training room almost the entire morning while I was there ...," Gordon said in his affidavit.

Though each of the affidavits said Gaskins was in the training complex that morning, Johnson said none of them positively indicates his presence at the time of the assault.

Group displays hatred

► Hate propaganda posters attacking the Jewish people, President Clinton and the media have been posted on campus.

J. Scot
staff reporter

Hate propaganda against Jews has been circulating K-State.

"I saw it posted on a bulletin board in Willard Hall," Justin Moore, sophomore in nutrition and exercise science, said.

Moore said he felt it would be better in his hands than someone else's.

"I do not agree with what the document says," he said.

The document titled "Who are the REAL haters?" opens with, "There is a specter haunting America, the specter of Arlen Jew Specter."

The document was signed the Heartland Revolutionary Guard.

It goes on to attack President Clinton and gun control by referring to him as the American Hitler.

The document continues with, "Psychos running amok in schoolyards with assault weapons are being controlled via Top Secret implant/microwave relay device beaming from downtown Tel Aviv."

The media are also targeted. "The treasonous liberal media schemes to destroy God's people with its relentless lynch-mob campaign of hatred and harassment."

The document then said "We shall bomb them to the bargaining table with our spurious allegations of anti-semitism."

It said "Every Christian patriot knows that anti-semitism is a myth and vicious lie invented by the Jews."

Then it refers to Jews as Christ-killers and said Jews are the secret financiers of the Third Reich.

This group then blames the Munich Olympics and the Lebanese marine barracks terror attacks on the Jews and said these events "had the slimy Jew fingerprints all over them. Even as we speak, berserker (sic) Mossad operatives are running around blowing up France."

The document's final paragraph talks turns to abortion. "Life is human sacrifice to our secular Satanic government. We must erect a pure nation, a Christian republic uncontaminated by Jew ingredients before Jesus may again tread this land."

It closes by relating the Bible into its rhetoric.

"God's law says life begins at conception. Science says all sin-sex females 'spontaneously abort' dozens of fertilized eggs yearly. God's law says these females are mass murderers. They have had their binge - now comes purge. Now comes justice. They shall pay."

It is a bunch of rambling garbage, Moore said.

"It frightens me that this kind of

Student flees parking-lot attackers

Sara Edwards
staff reporter

Monday at 6:29 p.m., a student reported being chased in parking lot A-3.

The student, who asked that her name be withheld, had just left Justin Hall, and she was going out to her car, between the President's Residence and All Faiths Chapel.

When she heard running through the leaves, she ran for her car.

"I kind of heard something and started jogging," she said.

Then she heard more noise in the leaves near the President's Residence.

"I just bolted," she said.

The student reported she saw two males. One was behind a tree and one was out in the open, she said.

"I turned around, and they were coming out of the bushes," she said.

She said she got into the passenger side of her car and crawled over to the driver side and backed out.

One of the males threw a rock at her windshield as she was backing up. The rock scraped her windshield. The damage was estimated at $200.

There are no suspects in the case so far, K-State police investigator Richard Herrman said.

The chase in lot A-3 and the Oct. 31 robbery of a student in lot B-2, when a woman was knocked unconscious and robbed of $20, have raised concerns about safety in parking lots.

"We need to make people aware that they need to be careful and use caution," Herrman said.

Although there hasn't been an unusual amount of crime on campus this year, Herrman said, there have been two incidents in the past week.

"You could say it is unusual,"

► CITY COMMISSION

City supports TDM, gives $1.2 million

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

The city commission voted 5-0 to approve $1.24 million in incentives for Troy Design and Manufacturing Co.

The $1.24 million is part of the $2 million needed by TDM to bring a natural-gas-conversion facility to Manhattan.

The natural-gas facility will be an addition to the electric-vehicle-production plant TDM already plans to build in Manhattan.

"It is in my opinion to spend the money when you have it to make the sun shine," Bruce Snead, city commissioner, said.

The breakdown in incentives offered from the city of Manhattan for the natural-gas-conversion facility equates to $975,000 in job incentives from the Manhattan economic development opportunity fund, and a participatory loan of $270,000 in training funds.

The $975,000 will strip the economic development fund of all its money for the rest of the year.

Shuttle service to begin Nov. 13

Sara Edwards
staff reporter

K-State Parking Services will begin a free, experimental shuttle service in an effort to make it easier for people to get to the far reaches of campus.

The shuttle will operate during the fall and spring semesters.

The service will begin Nov. 13 and continues through May while classes are in session. The shuttle runs from 8:45 a.m. to 4 p.m.

The shuttle will go between Edwards Hall, the K-State Student Union and the KSU Foundation Center.

"I think it will help to get people where they want to go," John Lambert, director of public safety, said.

The shuttle will make it easier on human resource workers going back and forth between the buildings, and it will make it easier to get to buildings on the outskirts of campus, Lambert said.

"That's where the campus just expanded to in different years," Lambert said.

The shuttle will allow staff and students to park at one building and get around campus without moving their cars and having to search for a new parking space.

Many people need transportation to Edwards because employment and payroll are there.

"Since parking is a little difficult to find, we think it will save them a lot of time,"

Lambert said.

Parking Services is using a 12-passenger van for the shuttle. There is no charge to ride the shuttle at this time.

The shuttle is operating for a one-year trial period.

If it works, Parking Services will enlarge the shuttle service. If not, the shuttle service will be shut down, Lambert said.

In the future, the shuttle service could be expanded to include more buildings on campus. The service could be paid for by a set user fee or bus passes.

If you look at any bus program, it requires user fees, Lambert said.

"It depends on what the people want," he said.

In the news

PROSECUTORS CONSIDER REFILING CHARGES IN SNOOP DOGG CASE

LOS ANGELES — Murder charges were dropped against one of rapper Snoop Doggy Dogg's co-defendants, but prosecutors said they will consider refiling the charges.

"It's not our intention to let him walk on this case," prosecutor Ed Nison said Monday.

The prosecution said it asked that charges against Sean Abrams, Snoop's body guard be dismissed in an attempt to get around a judge's order regarding statements Abrams and co-defendant McKinley Lee, also a body guard, made to police.

Prosecutors were ordered to edit out the portions of each man's statement that might incriminate his co-defendants.

Prosecutors want to use the full statements to show discrepancies between defendants' accounts and those of eyewitnesses.

Snoop, 23, whose real name is Calvin Broadus, was indicted with Lee, 25, and Abrams, 25, in the 1993 drive-by shooting of Philip Woldemariam.

The defendants claim Lee, fired the fatal shot in self defense when Woldemariam reached into his waistband as though preparing to pull a gun. Jury selection resumes Monday in the murder trial of Lee and the 23-year-old rapper.

OFFICERS FIRED FOR DOG DEATH

NEW YORK (AP) — Nearly a year after the death of the precinct mascot, the police commissioner has fired two officers and accused them of beating the beagle for soiling the station house, the Daily News reported Tuesday.

The droopy-eared dog named Fred was rescued from the streets and had his own chair at the 1st Precinct, as well as regular walks and meals.

He even visited some officers' homes on weekends.

One day last December, authorities said the dog angered Sgt. Hector Collazzo and Officer Gil Ilefonso by soiling the precinct gym. Authorities said they beat Fred senseless, stuffed him into the trunk of their squad car and delivered him to his death by injection at an animal shelter.

Monday, after departmental hearings lasting several months, an administrative judge recommended the officers be suspended for 20 days.

Instead, Police Commissioner William Bratton, an avowed dog-lover, took the more severe action.

The Sergeants Benevolent Association has promised to fight the punishment.

"This is an overreaction, and the punishment does not fit the indiscretion," Joe Toal, the group's president, said.

MIDSHIPMEN CAUGHT WITH LSD

ANNAPOLIS, Md. (AP) — Twenty-four Naval Academy midshipmen suspected of selling or using drugs face possible disciplinary action, and five of them could be court-martialed.

The investigation began last month when two midshipmen were caught with LSD off academy grounds.

They and three others are suspected of selling drugs, and Navy lawyers will recommend whether a court-martial should be convened.

The remaining 19 are suspected of using marijuana and LSD, academy spokesman Capt. Tom Jurkowsky said Monday.

The Navy has a zero tolerance policy for drug use, and Jurkowsky said any midshipmen found to be using drugs probably would be recommended for discharge.

That decision would be made by the secretary of Navy based on a recommendation from the superintendent.

All 4,000 midshipmen took drug tests in mid-October, and all tests were negative.

But Jurkowsky pointed out that some drugs, especially LSD, are flushed out of the system quickly.

About 300 midshipmen are tested randomly for drug use every week. In the past 2 1/2 years, Jurkowsky said, two midshipmen have been expelled for drug use.

IACOCCA SUES CHRYSLER CORP., CLAIMS UNLAWFUL STOCK HOLDING

DETROIT — Lee Iacocca is suing Chrysler Corp., claiming the automaker unlawfully prevented him from cashing in millions of dollars in stock options he earned while saving the company from bankruptcy.

In July, Chrysler's board denied Iacocca's request to buy 112,500 Chrysler shares and said he had violated stock plan rules that forbid him from working without Chrysler's permission.

That action came after Iacocca joined billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian in an abortive $23 billion attempt to take over Chrysler, then went to work as a consultant for Kerkorian.

Iacocca also has 1.6 million additional Chrysler options.

► PARKS AND RECREATION

Board proposes city park for Northview area

Robert Patnode
staff reporter

Residents in Northview want a city park in their area to meet the needs of their growing neighborhood.

A proposal for a new park in the northeast part of Manhattan was the topic of concern Monday night at the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Board meeting.

Ed Klimek, board member, said the Northview area is going to grow, creating a need for a park.

"It could be a jewel for that area," Klimek said. "The park needs to be large enough to handle future needs. It will evolve into other things with time."

If the proposal is approved, construction would begin in 1997, and the park would be in the area of Casement Road and Griffith Drive.

In a 1990 Census, the population of the northeast part of Manhattan was 6,727, nearly 18 percent of Manhattan's population. If the park is to be created, board members said they wanted it mainly for children.

Klimek outlined a seven-point plan for the park.

■ The first step would be to expand the public swimming pool in the Northview community.

■ The second point is to install practice fields. Klimek said he would like to see two baseball and softball fields and one soccer field created along Casement Road.

■ The third point of the plan would be to create a lighted walking trail, linking it with both the swimming pool and the practice fields. Klimek said the trail would need sidewalks and lighting.

■ The fourth point is to finish Linear Park Trail and link it along Casement Road so it connects with the other walking trail.

■ The fifth point is to create two tennis courts.

Klimek said the city could work in a joint venture with Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 to develop tennis courts on the future grounds of Eisenhower Middle School. The school district owns the land, and the board would have to work with them to build the tennis courts.

■ The sixth step would be to create additional walking trails by linking the sidewalks of the Northview area to Eisenhower Middle School.

■ The seventh step would be to purchase more land to facilitate the growing community and its need for a park.

Klimek's plan surprised residents.

A concern was land availability.

"We need a significant parcel of property," Mike Brodersen, Northview resident, said. "That is the key issue, and I don't know if there is enough space for the park."

Terry DeWeese, director of Manhattan Parks and Recreation and board member, said his two main concerns is the availability of resources to develop and maintain the park.

A community meeting is scheduled for 7 p.m. Nov. 28 to discuss the proposal with board members. If the proposal would be approved by the board, it would be sent to the city commission for a work session and final approval.

GASKINS

assault, about 10 a.m.

However police reports indicate one of the victims picked Gaskins' photograph along with several other players.

One other witness in the house identified Gaskins as being in the house.

"There's nothing to suggest we should question her credibility," Johnson said of the witness. "She was present in the house at the time the forced entry occurred, and she apparently knows Mr. Gaskins."

As a result, Johnson said the police will continue to gather information about any part Gaskins might or might not have played in the incident.

"I've asked our investigations division to reinterview witnesses at the house and contact the people who filed the affidavits," Johnson said.

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said the affidavits created sufficient doubt to discontinue the case.

"In my eyes, they created enough doubt to take action that we did," Kennedy said.

But Kennedy said he sees nothing wrong with a continued investigation.

"I think that's just fine," Kennedy said.

When the investigation is concluded, the county attorney's office will decide if there is enough evidence to bring charges against Gaskins again.

"Depending on the outcome, the county attorney's office can refile if they want," Johnson said. "Or he can have an inquisition and bring in all of the witnesses under oath."

An inquisition is a process the county attorney's office can use to clear up questions about an incident.

"An inquisition is a statutory creature wherein I call in various people that I think know something about a particular case on the record and under oath," Kennedy said.

Kennedy did not say whether he intends to call an inquisition.

"That's something you'll just have to wait and see."

Kennedy said bringing charges against Gaskins would not constitute double jeopardy.

A fifth affidavit in Gaskins' defense does not attest to his whereabouts, but it does indicate he denied any involvement in the incident.

Bruce Van De Velde, assistant athletic director for football operations, said he was present while police interviewed Gaskins about the incident. Although Gaskins terminated the interview, Van De Velde said the police indicated they believed Gaskins was not involved.

"The officers indicated that they wanted to talk to Percell because his name had been brought up, but one of the officers said 'we're almost 100 percent sure Percell was not involved. ...

After Percell denied being involved, he terminated the interview and walked out of the room; one of the officers then said, 'Well, if he would have stayed, we would have told him that we don't think he's involved', or words to that effect (he said this to me at least twice); then one of the officers, although I am not sure of his exact words, said something to the effect that it was difficult to pick the right person because they looked the same. I do not know if he was quoting the victim or if it was the officer's opinion ...." Van De Velde said in his affidavit.

Johnson said there may have been a miscommunication, and the investigator did not claim to know whether Gaskins was guilty or innocent.

"I've talked with the investigator who looked into the matter, and he said he absolutely made no such remarks," Johnson said. "What he did say was that his position in the matter is to get the facts. We have as much responsibility to investigate the innocence of a suspect as to investigate his guilt."

Johnson said the most important matter at this point is establishing whether Gaskins was or was not in the house at the time of the assault, because entry into the house is unlawful.

"Although the particular offenses may vary, all of the intruders were in violation of the law."

PRINCIPLES OF SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

RECENTLY, MORNINGSTAR CALLED US CHEAP. IT'S NOT EVERY DAY YOU GET A COMPLIMENT LIKE THAT.

All financial companies charge operating fees and expenses—some more than others. Of course, the lower the expenses you pay, the better. That way more of your money goes where it should—towards building a comfortable future.

We make low expenses a high priority.

Because of our size and our exclusive focus on serving the needs of educational and research communities, TIAA-CREF's costs are among the lowest in the insurance and mutual fund industries.<sup>1</sup>

In fact, Morningstar, Inc.—one of the nation's leading sources of variable annuity and mutual fund information—says, "Size isn't a constraint; it...enables CREF to realize a remarkable economy of scale."<sup>2</sup> According to Morningstar's data, CREF's "minuscule" 0.31% average fund expense charge was less than half that charged by comparable funds.<sup>3</sup>

TIAA's traditional annuity also charges no fees aside from a very modest operating expense of 1/4 of 1% of annuity assets. Interest and dividends are reported after all operating costs have been deducted. Standard & Poor's calls TIAA's costs "exceptionally low."<sup>4</sup>

Of course, expenses are only one factor to consider when you make an investment decision. While we're committed to keeping our expenses down, we spare nothing in striving to provide top-quality investment choices, financial expertise, and personal service. Because that can make a difference in the long run, too.

TIAA-CREF seeks performance, not profit.

At TIAA-CREF, we believe people would like to spend more on retirement, not on their retirement company. If you'd like to see how our approach can help keep more of your money working for you, call us at 1 800 842-2776 (8 a.m. to 11 p.m. ET, weekdays). We'd consider it a compliment.

KSU Parking Service presents a Shuttle System

Due to the expansion of Kansas State University to several remote buildings on and off campus, and the relocation of departmentally interactive units, Parking Services will begin an experimental shuttle service. The shuttle van will travel from K-State Union (south entrance) to Edwards Hall (east entrance), back to K-State Union and then to Foundation Building (main entrance facing Anderson Avenue). Starting on November 13, 1995 the van will operate from 8:45 a.m. to 4 p.m. each day students are in class during the Fall and Spring semesters. At this time, there will be no charge to individuals utilizing this shuttle.

The temporary and first schedule for the van will be as follows:

Departure	Destination
KSU Union	Edwards Hall
Morning Hours - 8:50 a.m., 9:30 a.m., 10:10 a.m., 10:50 a.m., 11:30 a.m., 12:10 p.m.
Afternoon Hours - 12:50 p.m., 1:20 p.m., 2:10 p.m., 2:50 p.m., 3:30 p.m., 4:10 p.m.
Edwards Hall	KSU Union
Morning Hours - 9 a.m., 9:40 a.m., 10:20 a.m., 11 a.m., 11:40 a.m.
Afternoon Hours - 1 p.m., 1:40 p.m., 2:20 p.m., 3 p.m., 3:40 p.m.
KSU Union	Foundation Building
Morning Hours - 9:10 a.m., 9:50 a.m., 10:30 a.m., 11:10 a.m., 11:50 a.m.
Afternoon Hours - 1:10 p.m., 1:50 p.m., 2:30 p.m., 3:10 p.m., 3:50 p.m.
Foundation Building	KSU Union
Morning Hours - 9:20 a.m., 10 a.m., 10:40 a.m., 11:20 a.m., 12 p.m.
Afternoon Hours - 1:20 p.m., 2 p.m., 2:40 p.m., 3:20 p.m., 4 p.m.

PLEASE NOTE: This is a trial period only and if the need for a shuttle system is evident, funds will have to be generated to support the program. The funds will have to be generated from sources other than the Kansas Legislature or Board of Regents.

County commission's agenda exists for purpose

The Riley County Commission should be more responsible about not only the issues discussed and voted on, but also the people it is trying to represent.

Be sure to watch for the Riley County commission agenda on the Collegian's Diversions page.

The agenda is getting to be a bigger mystery than any crossword puzzle.

The Riley County commissioners voted Monday night not to proceed with a proposal to move a 10-county, household hazardous waste site.

There was only one problem with this vote — it was not on the agenda.

Hopefully, there was no one in the general public who might have been concerned about the positioning of this waste transfer station.

If there were, they would not have gotten a chance to be heard.

Commissioner Russ Frey said the commission could vote on issues that were not listed on the agenda.

"The only reason the vote was taken was because it came up at the previous week's meeting and came up during the minutes," he said.

Following this logic, the county commission can make its agenda up as it goes along.

The only procedure that must be followed is that someone must simply mention a topic or proposal to make it eligible to be voted on.

This is surely a dangerous policy to follow.

The Riley County Commission should be more responsible about not only the issues discussed and voted on, but also the people it is trying to represent.

The point of having an agenda, indeed any sort of formal government structure, is to prevent anarchy from reigning and to give the public a voice in the decisions that affect them.

Using the Riley County Commission's methods, people will not know when it's their turn to speak.

► REC DISCUSSION GROUP

Editor,

The Recreational Services Council would like to inform Collegian readers about the discussion between the council and the social work students regarding child care at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Nov. 1, the Recreational Services Council listened and participated in open dialogue with social work students and others regarding establishing child care at Rec Services.

The requests for Rec Services to provide, fund, staff and administer child care were both personal and emotional. A lengthy, open dialogue provided both groups an opportunity to examine and clarify the issues and perspectives.

Discussion included other University child care models, funding sources, advantages, disadvantages, staffing and state regulations. The Recreational Services Council affirmed there is a need for expanded child care services on campus.

The mission and philosophy of Recreational Services were reiterated and examined in consideration of the requests.

The Recreational Services Council unanimously reaffirmed that last year's action is still viable, and providing child care at the Rec is not the role of Recreational Services.

The Recreational Services

Council suggested the issue be brought to campus-wide attention for a campus-wide solution for child care as it is not solved by being building specific.

Additionally, a recommendation was made for the development of a valid and reliable survey on the needs and a solution to meet these needs. The Recreational Services Council encouraged the group to continue exploration of expanding those established child care services already available.

Appreciation is expressed for the time spent by the group on its class project, presentation and passion for its beliefs.

► BIBLE'S VIEWS ON PAGANS

Editor,

In reply to Kevyn Jacobs' column in the Oct. 30 Collegian, let me clear something up. First, Christians do not hate homosexuals, Pagans or anybody else. We are intolerant of their actions. The difference is we accept the person but will not accept them together.

Second, to address the issue of witchcraft. Here is something associated with Darwin: "Only the strong will survive." A more appropriate one would be more like, "Only the strongest will thrive."

As Jacobs wrote earlier, Paganism, or witchcraft, was persecuted and finally driven far underground.

If we apply Darwin's infamous statement and the revision, Paganism was not the strongest. Might does not make right, but the one left standing is the one that is heard.

To some, it might sound as if you are making a lot of noise to get attention. Why? What are you afraid of?

For any further questions, refer to the Bible. Here is where I believe you should start — John 3:16-18 and Matthew 5:43-44.

Milestones reached in AIDS history

The course of human history was irrevocably changed in 1981 when the first case of AIDS, acquired immune deficiency syndrome, was diagnosed.

The disease itself has a life of its own, much like those it has felled. Although originally perceived as a homosexual disease, the fact remains that AIDS and human immunodeficiency virus is regarded as a heterosexual disease on a worldwide basis.

It may be contracted by anyone — regardless of sexual orientation or ethnicity.

HIV and AIDS are two separate things.

HIV is a virus that attacks T-4 helper cells, which are the cells that orchestrate the attack on invading viruses in the system. The average, HIV-negative person has a T-4 count of 1,000. HIV slowly eradicates these cells, and when their number decreases to 200, that person is considered to have AIDS.

The person's body is then prone to an opportunistic infection, which is a disease that the human body normally fights off automatically.

From the point of infection, there is a period referred to as a window period of three to six months when the virus is non-detectable by an HIV test. An HIV test consists of three consecutive tests.

The first two are called Enzyme Linked Immuno Sorbent Acid tests, and the third is termed a Western Ink Blot test. This test is available through Lafene Health Center, and it is also 99.8 percent effective in diagnosing AIDS.

Ultimately, AIDS is a disease of both science and lifestyle.

It is a disease that is rooted in behavior, giving birth to high-risk groups.

This does not just mean people who engage in unprotected sex or use intravenous drugs. The highest risk groups in this country are college-age, rural women.

From a national standpoint, all of Kansas is considered on a statistical level of being rural.

Even though there are a few people who have contracted HIV through blood transfusion, the chance that may happen is small.

Due to testing, the risk of contracting AIDS through a blood transfusion is one in 250,000.

HIV is transmitted through blood, semen, vaginal fluids and breast milk. It cannot live outside the body for long periods and only in the aforementioned fluids.

It can't be contracted through casual contact, dry or wet kissing or mosquitoes.

HIV-negative people are more at risk of harming those with AIDS than vice-versa, as an HIV-negative person carries the opportunistic germs that infect those with AIDS.

The best protection against HIV is abstinence.

However, The Center for Disease Control asserts that a condom is 95 percent effective when used properly every time, and the chance of contracting the disease is lower.

In a 1992 issue of the American Journal of Sexually Transmitted Diseases, a report found sex with a properly-used condom is 100,000 times safer than unprotected sex.

Additionally, condoms reduce the risk of pregnancy.

Birth control methods, such as a diaphragm, the pill or Norplant do not prevent transmission of HIV.

AIDS has a wide reach.

As of March 1995, 1,415 cases of AIDS have been documented in Kansas since 1982. This number does not include the number of people in Kansas who are HIV-positive and don't know it.

According to a survey commissioned by Newsweek, one in every 250 college students is HIV-positive. Following these figures, roughly 84 students on this campus are HIV-positive or have AIDS.

This is not a reason to act with suspicion toward everyone you meet.

You won't catch the HIV virus from kissing or hugging, using the shower in your residence hall or house or sharing cups and drinking fountains.

You do stand a higher chance of contracting HIV if you lead a risky lifestyle.

And you live in fear and paranoia unless you educate yourself.

From Nov. 27-30, members of the campus SHAPE (STD HIV AIDS Peer Educators) volunteer organization will be in a booth in the K-State Student Union.

Dec. 1, K-State will honor World AIDS Day with a public address and a ceremony.

The bell in Anderson Hall will ring 15 times to remember the 15 years the disease has been diagnosed in our society, as well as in our global community.

It is important to know the facts. This disease is not some message from God, nor is it something invented by the government to persecute people.

It is a disease that affects everyone. If current trends in transmission don't change, by the year 2000, we will all know someone with AIDS or who is HIV positive.

Once again, this is not a cry for persecution — this is a cry for education.

Educate yourself about the disease, the society you live in and your own behavior.

U.S. citizens lag behind in

Trashing litter

To the two guys walking behind me Tuesday morning in Kedzie Hall:

I have a personal pet peeve that's been with me for a long time, I had almost forgotten about it, but thanks to you two, I was reminded.

Littering.

Neither one of you liked the signs posted around campus asking you to put your litter where it belongs. You both seemed to agree picking up after you was the job of the custodians, since that is "... why they were hired."

I believe the term "litter" is a lazy janitor's word.

The custodians aren't lazy. They have a lot to do and not having to scout every row of the classrooms leaves them more time for the truly important things, like making sure there's plenty of toilet paper and no standing puddles of water on slick floors.

Because I like the custodians and think most of them are nice people, I will take it upon myself to educate you two about your place on this campus and in this society.

Lesson one: After you use, read, unwrap or otherwise consume something, get off your butt and throw the leftovers away.

Lesson two: It is no one else's job to make sure you are considerate enough to leave some place as clean as you found it. You should do it anyway in the hopes that the next person will do the same.

Discussion question: Do either one of you want to be remembered as the only college graduates who couldn't find a trash can? Why do I ask?

If either one of you ever recycles or throws away one piece of trash, I'll feel that I've done my bit for a better world.

I think my aversion to trash stems from a combination of living in the residence halls for a year, working in the Collegian offices and living with my little brother — possibly one of the sloppiest individuals to grace the planet.

I have also been given a great appreciation of nature. Nothing ruins a camping trip like coming across a pristine Colorado valley, settling into what you believe is an untouched campsite, only to find someone else's Bud Lite cans floating in the stream. Aluminum is not that heavy. Carry it out.

I admit that the Colorado Rockies have been used as a giant waste disposal site for decades, and my one little column won't change much. But I can do something about trash on campus. Sitting down in a classroom should not be an obstacle course of pop cans and old papers.

To me, the whole complaint is completely stupid. Picking up after yourself is a requirement of living in this society.

If you made it out of kindergarten, you should know that littering is basically wrong. It's right up there with not sharing and refusing to participate in group activities.

It is not unimaginable for a city to decide to keep trash off the streets. Disneyland has done it, and parts of Europe seem to have figured it out. Why is the United States lagging behind?

This is not a hard thing I'm talking about. It's mostly just a matter of being aware of your surroundings and taking responsibility for them.

Think of the peace of mind that will come from knowing you can walk barefoot anywhere, anytime, because other people were nice enough not to break bottles on the sidewalk and cleaned up after their dogs.

This planet is crowded enough, already. Do we have to leave a trail?

Goooooooooooooooood morning, America

■ K-State ROTC cadets earn national honors

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

About 25 K-State Army ROTC cadets and one cadre member will be yelling, "Good morning, America," to a national TV audience Thursday morning.

The cadets will represent K-State on "Good Morning America," which broadcasts on ABC affiliates across the country and will appear on local channel 49 at 7 a.m.

The segment was videotaped last September by a local television crew but will be aired this week in honor of Veteran's Day.

"A couple of months ago they filmed us at the football stadium, but we wanted it to air in conjunction with the week of Veteran's Day," Lt. Joel Snyder, Gold Bar recruiter, said. Cadets were selected from each class to participate in the filming, Snyder said.

"Because it was the first of the year, they picked out some of the cadets that had long-term interests in the program," said Mike Pearce, Battalion Commander of K-State ROTC.

Pearce said the taping has helped the program gain recognition at the University and on a national level.

"This seems to generate a lot of interest around here. I heard President Wefald even asked about it," Pearce said.

"The national recognition is also really good," Pearce said.

Not only is the national recognition good for the program, but it is also good for the University, he said.

The K-State ROTC program has been honored for its excellence on the national and state levels, Snyder said. The program has been awarded the Founders and Patriots of America Award for Excellence for two of the last three years,

ROTC

► The K-State Army ROTC cadets will appear on the "Good Morning America" show at 7 a.m. Thursday on KTKA 49 (cable channel 5).

Snyder said. This award is given to the best ROTC battalion west of the Mississippi River.

"This is a pretty crowning achievement for our program," he said.

The group has also been honored as the best battalion in the state of Kansas for the last four years, he said.

Snyder said they plan to tape the show so that the cadets who are in class when the segment airs can watch the show at a later time.

John Evans, senior in management and ROTC cadet, said he is excited about being on national television.

"I'm going to tape it and watch it at home," he said.

Fraternity collects food for charities

J. Scott
staff reporter

The third annual North American Food Drive sponsored by Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity Saturday, collected more than 522,000 pounds of food for charities across North America.

"We are expecting the amount to go up since not all chapters have reported in," said Kevin O'Neill, director of chapter services at Lambda Chi national headquarters.

O'Neill said results could total as high as 545,000 pounds of food collected.

"Our goal was 500,000, and we have surpassed our goal. We are pretty happy with our results," he said.

Two hundred Lambda Chi chapters throughout the United States and Canada participated in the event, he said.

"For our third year, this already has proven to be a successful philanthropy for Lambda Chi," he said.

The NAFD is the largest one-day philanthropic event ever sponsored by a greek-letter organization, he said.

K-State's Lambda Chi chapter collected food during the beginning of the semester.

"We collected during Dad's and Family Weekend and the kidnapping event we had. Also, we had parents bring up food," said Todd Black, senior in chemical engineering and Lambda Chi internal vice-president.

The Lambda Chis collected about 2,000 pounds of food that will go to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, he said.

"For our first year this was a success, and we have realized some things we can do differently," he said.

K-State Lambda Chis have already started planning their participation for next year, he said.

Black also said Lambda Chi want the house mom kidnapping to be bigger in future years.

Even though the K-State Lambda Chi did not reach the goal of 4,000 pounds that was set by the national headquarters, they are pleased with the results, he said.

"We have the satisfaction in the house," Black said. "That is the main thing."

Jeff McMillen, senior in civil engineering, said the philanthropy was a good experience for K-State's Lambda Chi chapter.

"We are one of the best chapters in our fraternity," he said. "And because this event occurs during homecoming, we have not been able to fully get involved."

McMillen said the Lambda Chi still have a lot of kinks to work out, and he is optimistic about next year's participation.

"This year it was not to its full potential," he said.

Black said this year NAFD was a minor philanthropy for the K-State Lambda Chis.

"In the years to come, it has to get bigger," he said.

► PRESENTATION

College of Agriculture sponsors teaching, technology workshop

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

The "Teaching with Technology" workshop will be presented by the College of Agriculture Thursday in the K-State Student Union Big 8 Room.

"Basically, it's one of a series of workshops on enhancing teaching effectiveness in agriculture," said John Havlin, professor of agronomy and Faculty Senate president.

William Graves, associate provost for information technology and professor of mathematics and of information science at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, will be the keynote speaker at the conference.

Graves has given more than 250 presentations and written extensively on information technology in higher education.

Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and instruction and the dean of continuing education, will also speak at the workshop.

"After the speakers, there will actually be a hands-on demonstration of the technology," Havlin said.

The speakers will give their presentations from 1:30 to 3 p.m. and the demonstrations will be given from 3 to 5 p.m.

NFL CELEBRATES 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF DEMPSEY'S KICK

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Tom Dempsey was an unlikely hero. Born without part of his right foot, he wore an orthopedic shoe and kicked for the New Orleans Saints — an expansion team that won just 12 games in its first four years. Of course, if Dempsey had played for a better team, he probably wouldn't have made NFL history with a 63-yard, game-winning field goal — a record that stands 25 years later. "It's a desperation play, not something a team is going to try too often," Dempsey said. "It would have to be the last play of the half or the last play for the game, probably the last play of the game. No one would risk it otherwise."

The greatest there ever was calls it quits

More than 350 members of the print media, 17 television networks and almost 200 radio stations are set up in the crowded press room in the rear of K-State's Vanier Football Complex, when finally He appears.

A quiet hush comes over the press conglomerate, and all that can be heard are the repeated clicking of the photographers' cameras that are spread throughout the room. He makes His way to the front of the room, sits at the front table and is followed by various family members, friends and loved ones. Finally, He speaks. "I thank you for coming," He says. "For today is a joyous and momentous day."

The press is confused. "Today we celebrate the end of a career," He says. "Today — I walk away." At once, the press rises to its feet and pandemonium ensues. Questions are thrown out left and right, no one audible above the racket. He just looks and smiles that smile they know so well.

"Let me explain," He says as the press slowly quiets. "I've been doing this many a year, and I like to think I have accomplished some things, but Sunday was the pinnacle of my career. Sunday I proved I can accomplish no more at this level."

The press still seems confused, when He produces a copy of Sunday's Topeka Capital-Journal newspaper.

He points to a story on the first page of the Topeka/Kansas section of the paper and begins to read a portion.

"A sports columnist for the Kansas State Collegian wrote last week that students shouldn't have torn down the goalposts after the Wildcats defeated the KU Jayhawks 41-7 in Manhattan," He says slowly. "The writer, Todd Stewart, said the Cat faithful should have exited quietly after the final gun."

"And there is a lot more," He slowly looks up from His paper. "Six paragraphs on me in the Topeka-Capital Journal — I'm a 19-year-old sophomore, and people are reading me all over the state," He says, slightly lowering His voice.

He pauses for a long while and looks at the crowd He was once a part of, until he can look no more for the tears can be ignored only so long.

"You see, people all over the state are reading a college reporter's works, can you believe that, a college reporter," He says, His voice shaking the entire time.

"What more can I do?" He asks, starting to break down as the tears stream down his cheeks. "I have nothing left to prove. I have always said I wanted to retire on top."

Finally, He loses it. He can not hide it in no more as the flood of emotions comes to the forefront.

"I love this career, it has become a part of me," He says. "But there is nothing more I can do."

He nods at one of His mentors, Kansas City Star columnist Jason Whitlock, when Whitlock stands and speaks to him.

"But, Todd, man, you're the greatest," Whitlock says. "Please don't leave. You're the greatest K-State journalist ever. Increase the legend."

He smiles, Whitlock sits, and slowly He starts to answer.

"Son, legends live forever," He says. "The legend will live on."

Whitlock smiles and nods, knowing He is right.

"I thank all of you for coming. I love you all. You have made me what I am," He says, smiling through His tears.

"But this is the end. I have done it all. Today, I walk away."

Women's basketball team travels to Holton for exhibition opener

■ Coach Agler's team takes on Athletes in Action in point guard Amanda Chamberlain's hometown

Dan Lewerenz sports editor

K-State's women's basketball team hits the court tonight for its first action of the season. But unlike most exhibition games, tonight's game will not be at home.

The Wildcats will take on Athletes in Action at 7 p.m. in the Holton High School Gymnasium in Holton.

K-State fans in Holton approached the K-State coaching staff about moving the game to Holton.

"They approached us about it," Kelly Kramer, assistant coach, said. "Last year we got really good support from the Holton area, and with Amanda (Chamberlain) from Holton, they've done a really good job of raising sponsorship."

"It will be really good for the team to open on the road."

Coach Brian Agler said after weeks of practice, the Cats are ready to play someone new.

"We're still a little rusty, but overall the progress has been positive," Agler said. "We're ready to play somebody different."

The Cats' opponent will be Athletes in Action, a national team affiliated with Campus Crusade for Christ consisting primarily of former college all-Americans.

K-State defeated Athletes in Action in its exhibition opener last year.

But Agler said the biggest problem the Cats will face this year is the sheer size of the Athletes in Action team.

Athletes in Action's roster includes Vanderbilt alumna Heidi Gillingham, a 6-foot 10-inch center and the tallest woman ever to play NCAA basketball.

"They're huge, and they've got a better team than they did a year ago," Agler said.

But the Cats played against bigger teams all season last year, and Agler said he thinks K-State's experience will help the team tonight.

"But we've got more experience now. We're not going to match up size-wise, but I think we can compete," he said.

One familiar face the Cats will have to guard is Shelly Sheetz.

Sheetz graduated from Colorado last year after twice being named first-team all-America at point guard.

"They're huge, and they've got a better team than they did a year ago. But we've got more experience now. We're not going to match up size-wise, but I think we can compete."

Brian Agler K-STATE WOMEN'S BASKETBALL COACH

Chamberlain, the Cats' starting point guard, said she looks forward to matching up with Sheetz again.

"It's good for us as a team, and it's a real test for me," Chamberlain said.

Chamberlain said she agreed with Agler that the team is ready for different competition.

"We've gone at each other enough in practice," she said. "We're ready to play someone new."

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Junior post Andria Jones shoots during practice. Jones, one of eight returners to the Wildcat roster, started one game last season and is slated to start tonight.

Tennis in Rolex Regionals at Salt Lake City

Ryan O'Halloran and Rich Pefley Collegian

The K-State tennis team hopes to go into the off season this weekend with gusto as they take the hard courts in Salt Lake City for the Rolex Regional tournament.

Qualifying play in the singles division is Nikki Lagerstrom and in the doubles division are Yana Dorodnova and Karen Nicholson as play started yesterday on the University of Utah campus.

To make the main draw, they must play their way through the qualifying rounds.

The main draw in both divisions starts today, with senior Karina Kuregian seeded second in the singles.

She will face Linda Engblom of Utah.

"She's playing better and practicing better," Coach Steve Bietau said of Kuregian.

"Our main concern was that she wasn't playing well in the matches and her play in practice had a lot to do with it."

"She's just pushing herself and putting pressure on herself to practice better."

Dorodnova is seeded sixth in the singles, and has made the transition from clay courts to hard courts rather quickly, as evidenced by her making the championship match at the Big 8 Indoors last month in Topeka.

"Yana's been playing well," Bietau said.

"Her game has changed since she's been here and most of that's initiative. When she finds something that will help her win, she'll do it right away. We haven't forced her to change things because of the hard courts, she does it herself."

Dinah Watson, Lena Pilipchak and Nicholson are unseeded in the singles draw, which is full of Big 8 standouts.

"This is the strongest regional tournament in recent times," Bietau said.

"There aren't a lot of easy matches, so we'll just take them one at a time."

In the doubles, Kuregian and Pilipchak are seeded fifth.

Coming into the tournament, Bietau was optimistic about his team's chances of finishing the fall season in fine fashion.

"Overall, we had an extremely good week of practice," Bietau said.

"Dinah is playing her best tennis of the year, and Nikki Lagerstrom has played well."

► SNYDER PRESS CONFERENCE

No. 7 Wildcats determined not to relive slip-up in Ames, Iowa of 2 years ago

Ryan O'Halloran contributing writer

Two years ago, a 6-1-1 K-State team traveled to Iowa State after defeating Oklahoma for the first time in 32 seasons, and promptly stubbed their toe against the Cyclones, costing themselves a possible berth in the Fiesta Bowl.

This season, the 8-1, No. 7 Wildcats are coming off a resounding victory against the Sooners but insist they won't trip up against Iowa State (3-6) this time around.

"We can't spend our time thinking in that direction," K-State coach Bill Snyder said Tuesday. "We have to remember that things like that can happen if you're not careful and prepare yourself well."

Besides the concern of trying to stop Troy Davis, who has rushed for 1,647 yards this season, the Cats haven't played well in their three previous road games in 1995 although they're 2-1.

"You always have concern when you travel," Snyder said. "I think we've played well at times on the road and sometimes, we haven't played well."

This year, the Cats needed a game-winning catch from Kevin Lockett to edge Cincinnati and a fourth-quarter comeback to beat Oklahoma State. And K-State fans know what happened when the Cats traveled to Lincoln in their last road contest.

"This year, our ball game at Cincinnati bordered on atrocious in some aspects," Snyder said.

"We didn't play as we're capable of at Oklahoma State and we certainly did not play well at Nebraska. So, yes, we've got some concerns, but that's part of the learning process."

"As we've gone through those, we've learned some things, and every year is a different experience. Our players are competitive and like challenges."

Offensively, the Cyclones possess more than Davis. A solid offensive line, competent quarterbacks and an impressive receiving unit surround Davis.

"I don't think anybody can amass that type of statistic without a supporting cast," Snyder said. "I'm impressed by their offensive line. I'm impressed by their freshman quarterback (Todd Bandhauer). They have proven they are capable of throwing the football when it doesn't seem like that's what they do at all."

Because Davis will run straight ahead along with left and right, the offensive line has to be adequate.

"They're a very big offensive line," Snyder said.

"They block together well, and it's a coordinated effort."

Quarterbacks Bandhauer and Todd Doxzon have thrown for six touchdowns and 1,005 yards this season. Wideout Ed Williams is third in the Big 8 in receiving yards per game and sixth in receptions per game.

"The more you watch them, the more you realize they have done a nice job of keeping the chains moving," Snyder said.

Defensively, the Cyclones take the bend-but-don't-break approach, and last week against the top-ranked Huskers, they broke, giving up 73 points.

"They're a real secure defensive unit," Snyder said. "They've given up a lot of yards to the rush (288 yards per game), but they still have done a nice job."

► VOLLEYBALL

Netters to play host to last-place Jayhawks

Shana Nowell staff writer

"Lick KU."

Plain and simple, "Lick KU" is the theme for the K-State vs. Kansas volleyball match.

The K-State athletic department and Ott Food Products Company have consolidated their efforts to fill Ahearn Field House by handing out 3,000 free tickets to tonight's competition.

The last time K-State and Kansas met on the volleyball court was Oct. 14, the night of Kansas' Midnight Madness at Allen Fieldhouse.

The Wildcats defeated the Jayhawks in three close games in front of a crowd of 14,300 that evening. The Cats hope to repeat that feat tonight.

The largest crowd the Cats have played for in Ahearn was 2,842 when the team played host to No. 1 ranked Nebraska.

In addition to the free tickets, Ott Food Products Company will be handing out "Lick KU" suckers to the first 5,000 fans in attendance at the match. There will also be other drawings and giveaways.

The Jayhawks come to Manhattan in last place in the Big 8 with a 8-16 overall record, 1-8 in the conference. The Hawks are a half game behind Missouri who are 1-7.

The Cats hope to increase their conference record to 4-6 after playing the Jayhawks. K-State is 3-6 in the Big 8 and 17-8 overall.

The Cats will be led by junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk, junior play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young, freshman hitter Kim Zschau and senior hitter Jill Dugan.

DeClerk is hitting .366 on the season with a team high 288 kills. She is also has 225 digs for the team defensively and leads the squad with 112 block assists.

Young ranks second behind

DeClerk with 262 kills, hitting .267 for the season. Young also has 165 digs.

A true freshman, Zschau has had a tremendous effect on the squad with 249 kills as she has hit for .193.

But her presence has been most noticed defensively as she has posted 225 digs on the season, tying DeClerk for second place on the team.

Dugan's experience on the court has allowed her to be a constant force in the K-State lineup. She has 243 kills and 276 digs, and along with freshman middle blocker Val

Wieck leads the team with 12 solo blocks.

Sophomore setter Devon Rynning will also be an important element in the K-State offense. She has 1,144 set assists on the year, setting a new school record with every assist.

K-State coach Jim Moore was unavailable for comment.

If Wildcat fans have not had their fill of volleyball, they can stay to cheer on the KSU Men's Volleyball club as the men attempt to lick Kansas themselves.

The squad will take on the Kansas Men's Volleyball Club in a best of five games format.

Database access delayed for Macintosh

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

Faculty of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism passed a resolution last week requesting University libraries withhold a portion of the final payment for the new Endeavor/Voyager database system until it is available to Macintosh users.

The Endeavor/Voyager system software, which will replace Farrell Library's Lynx catalog system that the University has been using since 1989, will cost about $200,000 to implement, Brice Hobrock, dean of University libraries, said.

And another $500,000 will be required to get the system running, Hobrock said.

The new system will have an on-line catalog, abstracts of magazine articles and eventually full text articles. It will also allow users to get on the Internet to check for materials that Farrell Library does not have that another library might have, Hobrock said.

The Endeavor/Voyager system is scheduled to replace software on IBM-compatible computers by the end of November, Hobrock said.

Endeavor Systems Inc., the company developing the new software, first developed software for IBM-compatible computers, Dave Allen, director of library network service, said. But the new on-line system will not be made accessible for the University's Macintosh computers until summer 1996, Hobrock said.

Until the Macintosh software is developed, Macintosh users will be able to use a character-based system to access the new system. The character-based program is similar to Lynx, the system the library uses now, Hobrock said.

"Our position is that no one on campus when we implement our new system will be left with less than what they have today. In fact, they will have more," Hobrock said.

Carol Oukrop, director of the school of journalism, said the new system will be the standard updated source of information. All computer users should have access to the system at the same time.

"I would prefer that the whole process be available to us at the same time as the other computer users, but it will be eventually," Oukrop said.

John Bucher, director of computing and network services, said the journalism school and the College of Education are the only areas of the University that use Macintoshes as a main source of computers.

Oukrop said the character-based system, which will temporarily replace the Lynx system, is much harder to use.

"Usually the information is there, but you have to work to get it," Oukrop said.

Charles Pearce, associate professor of journalism, said the resolution to withhold payment to the software company was passed because in the past, software companies have failed to deliver software on time.

"Our concern about the money was, from what we understand, that K-State is a test site for the software. Our experience with test sites is that software is delayed in coming out or never comes out," Pearce said.

The journalism school wanted the University to have a leverage on the company to ensure the software compatible with Macintoshes is delivered on time, Pearce said.

The best way to have leverage on the company is to withhold part of the payment for the new system, he said.

Dennis Devenney, network and technical support supervisor for the education college, said he understands the journalism school's concern, because software companies do not always guarantee that a product is produced before deadline.

The University needs to make sure the software is delivered on time, Devenney said.

He said he will check to see if the software is being developed every two or three months.

"We worked with the library, and they've been very reasonable. And I'm sure that they've chosen the most efficient route," Devenney said.

If the software is not developed on time, many people will be upset, he said.

Both the journalism school and the education college frequently use the library, and both use Macintosh as a primary source of computers, Devenney said.

Allen said rather than wait for the Macintosh software to be developed, the library staff decided to make the new system available to IBM users as soon as possible.

"The value of the new system is its ability to gather resources that are scattered all over the world. It's going to be a major change in how people research," Allen said.

The system in use now does not allow users to view databases without going to the library, and it also does not have abstracts or full length texts.

Hobrock said the current mainframe system is being replaced because it is not state of the art and it is not expandable.

Also the system lacks software that would cost more to develop than switching to the new system, he said.

Advantages of the new system include that it is easier to use and it allows the users to connect directly with other library systems around the world, Allen said.

All Kansas regents universities were working together for three or four years to get a proposal passed by the legislature to get funding to switch to the new UnixS-based system.

Allen said in 1994, the legislature approved funds to go to the universities to upgrade library systems.

The money received had to be spent in the 1995 fiscal year.

► JEWELRY THEFT

Dentist charged with murder, robbery

Associated Press

SOMERVILLE, N.J. — A dentist accused of helping mastermind a botched jewelry store robbery in which the owner's wife was killed said he had nothing to do with the crime.

Harry Insabella, 37, of Franklin Park, told the Courier-News of Bridgewater that authorities are railroad him because of his sporadic association with college friend Avram Gottlieb, a career criminal accused of plotting the holdup.

Insabella is charged with murder and robbery in the March 13 jewelry store robbery in Franklin Township that left Brenda Wolf dead. He could get a life sentence if convicted.

"I'm not guilty of those charges. I want to emphatically state I had nothing to do with Brenda Wolf's death, any robberies, any of that stuff," Insabella told the newspaper for Monday's editions.

"The only thing I'm guilty of is poor judgment in picking friends in regard to Gottlieb, but I don't think that's anything to put someone in jail for," he said.

Insabella, however, spent 33 days in the Somerset County jail after his arrest in the Wolf killing. He eventually posted $1 million bail.

During the robbery, store owner Jeffrey Wolf shot one of the suspected robbers, and one of his bullets struck his wife in the face, killing her. That led to the murder charges against Insabella and Gottlieb, who was waiting outside in a getaway car.

Insabella, during an interview at his attorney's office, sneered at the claim by Middlesex County authorities that he was suspected in the 1992 execution-style killing of Raul Torres, the husband of a woman with whom he was having an affair. That case remains unsolved.

"I was almost waiting for them to say I was on the grassy knoll for the Kennedy assassination," Insabella said. "I thought, what are they going to throw in next?"

Insabella operates his dental practice a mile from the jewelry shop. He said about 20 percent of his patients have left since he was charged.

"Brenda Wolf was a victim in this, but what seems to have got lost in the shuffle is that I'm a victim, too," he said.

Insabella said he will vigorously fight the state's evidence against him, including a key to his dental office that was found in a South Brunswick storage locker along with items from the robbery.

Authorities also traced phone calls from Gottlieb to Insabella's office hours after the robbery, and they have linked jewelry Wolf said he bought from Insabella to some stolen jewelry Gottlieb shipped to the dentist from the Kansas City, Mo., area.

The Derby Bakery tantalizes students with homemade treats

During the early morning hours, when the sun is still debating whether to brim over the horizon, K-State students are found creating delicate pastries, donuts and cookies in the lobby of the Derby Dining Center.

The Derby Bakery, which is in what used to be an employee coat room, was transformed into the retail sales shop in 1989, Mark Edwards, unit director for Derby, said.

"At first, the bakery had a limited menu, and the portions were of very generous sizes," Edwards said. "It still has generous portion sizes, but now it features many tempting treats and gifts."

Bagels, pecan rolls, bread, brownies and rice crispies can be found within the reach of the lobby bakery, Julie Leet, senior in hotel restaurant management and student manager of the bakery, said.

Leet, one of the students who runs the bakery, said parents like to call and order balloons and cakes for their students.

"Parents are usually the ones who order our personalized items because they can't always be there for their child," Leet said. "So, they order things from the bakery to have sent to their child."

Everything in the bakery is made from scratch, giving it that old-fashioned, homemade quality that is hard to find as a student, Edwards said.

"We offer that made-from-scratch quality for our students," Edwards said.

But the bakery also uses high-tech equipment to create personalized cakes and gourmet cookies, he said.

Every product sold at the bakery is made in the Derby Dining Center, Edwards said.

"We do not use mixes or anything that is frozen," Edwards said.

The bakery has established three goals to help it serve the University, Edwards said.

"Our main goal is to keep prices low so that residents can afford our stuff," he said.

The bakery also wants to generate profits, provide jobs for students enrolled in food-related curriculum and provide services for residents and other guests of the University.

Another goal for the bakery is to increase the revenue it generates.

Many residents do not buy food at the bakery because they are health conscious, Leet said.

"Right now, we are working on new products that we call guilt-free because they are fat-free products," Leet said.

The bakery needs to work on better advertising, because its mission is to serve the residents and their guests, she said.

In fact, many students do not know the bakery exists, and putting up more signs would help, Leet said.

"We are working on it," Leet said. "Most students find out about us by walking by and saying, 'What's that?' and they come over to check it out."

Resident Natalie Purnell, sophomore in business marketing, said she runs to the bakery when she has a craving.

"The bakery satisfies my cravings for sweets," Purnell said.

The bakery is open from 9 to 10:30 a.m., 1 to 4:30 p.m. and from 7 to 10:30 p.m. on Thursdays. It is also open from 9 to 10:30 a.m. and from 1 to 4:30 p.m. on Fridays.

The Derby Bakery, near the entrance of the facility, offers the surrounding residence halls with a variety of snacks ranging from cookies to muffins the students can purchase throughout the day.

Tube Sock empire can only be defeated with consumer help

I was recently at a friend's house, watching the critically acclaimed "Pulp Fiction." When asked if I would like some pretzels, I nodded abstractly, my eyes trained on the bizarre plot twisting on the screen.

"This film is an appraisal of the violence in our society," I said, suddenly filled with the knowledge of 10,000 philosophers as I reached for the bag of pretzels. "Furthermore, with the symbolic use of anima — AAAAAAGGGGGHHHH!"

I recoiled in horror when I glanced over to see my hand sticking out of a bag bearing the most loathsome words in the long and varied history of bagged pretzels: Sam's Club.

"This is too much! They have truly stepped over the line this time!" I screamed, shaking the quasi-patriotic red-white-and-blue-colored bag in the air.

My date began looking around nervously, edging toward the phone.

"Everything is fine," I said with a smile, becoming immediately calm. (At times like these, it helps to reassure people you're not going to kill them.) Thus, I began to explain my deep disdain for Wal-Mart.

No offense to the employees of that gargantuan factory that looms over the horizon in every significantly profitable American town, but I can't swallow its corporate philosophy, embodied in the mountains of tube socks towering on wobbly cardboard displays manufactured by cheap foreign labor.

I didn't go into that store WANTING tube socks, and I'll be damned if I'm going to buy into the philosophy of unplanned tube socks.

Oh, it's a huge problem in China. The ubiquitous government of that nation has mandated there will be no more than six pairs of tube socks per capita.

Luckily, we live in the land of the free, where the average American has no such restrictions thanks to the incredible foresight of Sam Walton. He was an erratic old buzzard who kept misplacing his undergarments. So, he created a macro world that would be conducive to his and others' capriciousness.

That world was Wal-Mart, a place where huge pallets of microwave popcorn may be found next to the Wonderbras. The concept is called cross-merchandising, and it is catching on.

Ever wonder why Dillon's has that toilet paper display right next to the tortilla chips? Or cassette tapes beside the doubtfully relevant baked beans at K-mart?

How about a stack of motor oil next to the dog food? It's time to end this marketing farce.

Contemporary philosophers, including renowned L. Ron Hubbard, have actually discussed opening a new branch of theory, Tube Sock Quantum Physics, to discuss this phenomenon.

And some new-age pundits have declared 1995 to be the Year of the Tube Sock.

I don't know about all that. But I have a dream. Having more faith in the consumer, I believe this is only a fad, and that someday soon I will walk into a Wal-Mart store and not be accosted by that stupid smiling face on the floor or the irrelevant, irreverent tube-sock displays.

GETTING READY FOR WINTER

Prepare for winter with tune-up

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

Transportation becomes a concern when ice covers the streets and temperature dip below freezing. Cold weather can take its toll on your car or motorcycle, causing it to stall or be a road hazard.

To avoid this, there are some things you can do now to prepare before the weather gets too cold.

"The best thing to do is get a tune-up, especially if you haven't had it done in a while," Terry Ekart, mechanic at Ekart Automotive Service, said.

A tune-up costs about $50, but will vary depending on the size of the engine and the amount of work that needs to be done. If the car needs new parts or unexpected labor the price will increase.

Some of the basic things you should have looked at when taking your car in for a tune-up is the spark plugs, cooling system, battery, fuel and air filters, Ekart said.

"You need to have the battery tested to make sure it will make it through the cold winter," Terry Wark, mechanic at Wildcat Amoco, said.

Another important thing to check is the cooling system. Antifreeze should be at the right levels, Ekart said.

Antifreeze is a coolant that has a lower freezing point and higher boiling point than water. It keeps the engine cool by circulating through the motor, Wark said.

It is important to have antifreeze in the engine during the winter months because it will not freeze, he said.

"Normally, you could just use water, but when it gets cold, water will freeze," Wark said.

All of the hoses and belts should be checked to make sure they are in good condition, because they can crack when it gets too cold, he said.

In order to assure safe handling of your car on the road, you should also make sure the tires are ready for slippery road conditions, Wark said.

"Check your tires for good tread and correct pressure for winter," he said.

Some things you can do at home is to turn on your car's heater to make sure that it works and store extra blankets and clothing in the trunk in case of an emergency.

If you are a motorcycle owner, there are special preparations you must do for storage of your motorcycle during the few months of winter during which you cannot ride it.

Motorcycles should be stored in a non-humid, damp-free area, like a garage. If that is not possible it should at least be placed under a covered area, Dirk Stanley, Snyder's Honda of Manhattan, said.

"If it's not possible to store the motorcycle inside, you should buy a cover for it that is breathable," Stanley said. "Don't use plastic."

You also need to prepare the fuel tank for storage. There are a couple of different ways to do this.

The first method is to completely drain the fuel tank, leaving it dry for storage. If you chose this method, the

For a motorcycle: Proper storage

■ Special preparations must be made for a motorcycle during the non-rideable months of winter. Motorcycles should be stored in either:

1. A non-humid, moisture-free area, like a garage.
2. Under a sheltered area with a cover that is breathable.

■ The fuel tank must also be prepared for storage. There are two main methods:

1. Completely drain the fuel tank, leaving it dry for storage. The empty tank should then be sprayed with an anti-rust agent.
2. Fill the tank up with fresh fuel and add a fuel stabilizer.

■ The battery should also be removed and stored in an accessible place, where it can be charged every two weeks.

Plants need to be inside during cold months

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

Like it or not, cold weather is here. While making your things-to-do-before-winter list, don't forget about your plants.

It's time to make room for your plants inside.

"The temperatures are getting cold enough," Connie Pfaff-Eickhoff, manager of Blooming Dale's Garden Center, said. "Right now is probably a good time to start bringing in plants."

If plants are left out much longer, they're health will start to go downhill, especially if they are tropical house plants, said Bruce Rose, owner of West Acres Greenhouse and Nursery in Junction City.

When you bring plants inside, you may experience some problems with bugs on the plants and in the soil, Rose said.

"The first thing you should do is spray for any insects that would have been on the plants, before you bring them in," Pfaff-Eickhoff said.

It is also a good time to transplant the plant and change the soil, because insects could have laid eggs in the soil, she said.

Plants can be sprayed or washed with an insecticidal soap to help debug them, Rose said.

If your plant is healthy and doesn't appear to have insects, it's still a good idea to repot them, Diane Hawkins, employee of Westside Market, said.

"Most house plants go dormant, and they don't grow much in the winter," she said. "If they are really root-bound, it probably wouldn't hurt to re-pot them."

To help plants adjust to the changes of moving indoors, they need to be acclimated to the temperature of the house, Rose said.

"To help the plants adjust, it is a good idea to put them in an area where they can get plenty of light," he said.

Depending on the type of plant you have, bright sunny windows are good places for plants, Pfaff-Eickhoff said.

"As long as your windows are air-tight and the plants are not touching any cold window sills, it should be OK," she said. "A plant will let you know if it is getting too much cold exposure. The leaves will start turning brown and black."

Another important consideration is the humidity levels in the house. Some house plants require a higher humidity levels, Rose said.

"Keep in mind, once heaters go on, you will have dryer conditions," he said. "Ferns and orchids are examples of high-humidity-type plants."

To increase the humidity level in plants, it is possible to set the pot on a saucer with gravel and water in it. The gravel does not allow water to be absorbed by the plant, but permits the moisture to pass through, he said.

Depending on the type of plant, watering instructions should also be followed while plants are indoors. Over-watering will contribute to fungus problems, Rose said.

WINTER

Motorcycle Winter Storage Guide.

According to the guide, you should also remove the battery and store it in an accessible place, where it can be charged every two weeks.

Stanley said it is important to store your motorcycle when it becomes really cold or when there are icy road conditions.

"Around here there are only about two months of non-rideable weather. But balance-orientated machines are not good on roadway conditions that can cause physical danger," he said. "And motorcycles are very balance orientated."

Another common mode of transportation for students are bicycles. They also have special needs during the cold months.

"If at all possible, we recommend keeping it inside. But if you live in a dorm, try to keep it on a covered rack," Derek Snyder, employee of Bikeworks, said.

The bike should also be wiped down after you ride it because of road salts, he said.

Tire pressure should also be checked periodically because tires tend to get low because of the cold, he said.

TDM

"The MEDOFAB money will all be gone," said Randy Martin, president of Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, "but it makes my heart raise because I can't think of a better way to spend it."

Commissioner Steve Hall said the city and the Chamber of Commerce needs to inform future business applicants that all money is concentrated on TDM.

"In fairness of future applicants, we need to be honest with them up front and tell them our focus right now is TDM," he said.

In order to fulfill the $2 million needed to bring the natural-gas facility to Manhattan, area sources contributed money to the incentive proposal.

Those area sources are K-State, Riley and Pottawatomie counties, Western Resources and private contributions.

"President Wefald said himself that K-State will donate $100,000 cash," Martin said.

Riley and Pottawatomie counties will be contributing $450,000. Western Resources estimated it will contribute around $100,000 in energy-use benefits.

"Our contribution is based on energy use," Wade Graves, representative from Western Resources, said. "Once they complete the designs of the facility, we'll know how much our contribution will be."

The addition of the natural-gas-conversion facility to Manhattan's TDM plant has caused many changes to previous plans and contracts.

"The plant size has increased from 40,000 to 60,000 square feet," Stinson said. "There will also be ample space for expansion capability of 30,000 square feet."

The TDM plant job projections also increased to a minimum of 198 jobs in the next five years, Martin said. Those jobs will have an average salary of $30,000 to $40,000.

Bill Coppola, TDM project manager, said with the addition of the natural-gas-conversion plant, two things changed. First, the opening of the plant will be delayed from February to May. "Ford has shown some contractual lenience," he said, "but we'll start producing some electric Rangers at our other plant in Detroit."

"As soon as we get some trainees up there, and we can flick the lights, we'll start rolling them off until we get the Manhattan plant open."

Second, Schultz Construction Inc. will be the contractor building the plant. Dunn Industrial Group Inc. from Kansas City had been chosen to do the job but was taken off the project.

The campus police are trying to increase awareness after last week's events, he said.

The department has encouraged sergeants to increase awareness, to have patrols more visible and to have more officers walking, Herrman said.

Herrman offered some tips for students' safety. He said students need to be aware of their surroundings.

"I thought that this young lady last night was very observant," Herrman said.

It is also a good idea to walk with a friend or use the escort service, Herrman said. When walking at night, walk in well lit areas. Have your keys ready in your hand as you walk to your car. You can use keys as a weapon.

"They scratch pretty deep," Herrman said.

"I don't think that what happened in those lots constitutes a pattern for K-State," Carla Jones, assistant dean of student life, said.

Jones said students need to do their part when it comes to safety.

"Safety works when students work with it," Jones said.

movement is active around here," he said.

Moore said he could not really make a judgment on what kind of movement it is.

"The person who wrote this was just pouring their mind out on paper," Moore said. "The person who wrote this, in my opinion, is unstable."

Moore said he thinks the reason propaganda like this is put up on college campuses is because so many people pass through them.

"It is a cheap and easy way to get people to see your message," he said.

Carla Jones, assistant dean of student life, said she had heard about this through K-State police back in mid to late September.

"The name of the group has been brought to our attention by KSUPD," she said.

This document shows intolerance, she said.

"It is something K-State students should not acknowledge," she said.

Jones said the document draws on narrow views.

"I do not see it as an immediate threat of danger," she said.

Within the college environment we are exposed to different views, and that is all this is, she said.

K-State police said this is the first incident they have encountered this semester, Richard Herrman, K-State police investigator, said.

"We had two previous incidents last year involving this group," he said.

Herrman said K-State police has let the surrounding agencies know and passed on information about this document.

"We have checked it out with the KBI, the FBI and the secret service," he said. "And they have come up with nothing on this group."

It makes it difficult because they are not identifying themselves, Capt. Robert Mellgren, with K-State police, said.

"There is no real substance to this document," he said.

And there is no need to give these groups free publicity, he said.

"This is not an unusual occurrence," Mellgren said.

"But it is not a frequent occurrence either."

Powell says no to candidacy

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After months of prayerful consideration that captivated the nation, Colin Powell awkwardly embraced the Republican Party Wednesday.

But said he would not run for president in 1996 because it was a calling he said he did not yet hear.

Ending an extraordinary political mystery, Powell ruled out seeking any elected office next year. Instead, he said he would dedicate himself to restoring the spirit of Abraham Lincoln to a Republican Party he said was a lot more diverse than many conservatives would care to admit.

"I'm sorry I disappointed you," the retired general said in a poignant tribute to the thousands of everyday Americans who had urged him to run, in person, through letters and by joining draft efforts.

"We're devastated," said James Lynch, a New York lawyer involved in the draft effort.

Said Tim Bush, an organizer in New Hampshire: "I think really the country is the loser."

Such support brought him to the brink of a candidacy, Powell said, but in the end he stepped back from elective politics — for now, anyway.

To run for president, he said, would demand a passion and commitment that, despite his every effort, he does not have because such a life requires a calling he didn't hear.

"For me to pretend otherwise would not be honest to myself, it would not be honest to the American people," Powell said.

Powell also ruled out being the GOP's vice presidential nominee but said he might consider an appointed government position. Many Republicans, even Powell critics, said the retired general was still almost certain to be considered for the No. 2 spot on the GOP ticket.

Powell's decision left 10 declared Republican candidates and one GOP giant still sitting on the fence: House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Gingrich said anew he was unlikely to run for president but that he would talk it over with his wife after Republicans finished work on the budget.

As he bowed out of the presidential race, Powell for the first time pledged political allegiance — to a Republican Party he said was rightly dedicated to balancing the budget, cutting taxes and shrinking government.

"I believe they have ideas and energy at this time that I can align with," he said.

But he bluntly rebuked prominent conservatives for ad hominem attacks on his character. He also said the party would be wise to show more compassion as it reformed welfare and to welcome minorities.

"I believe I can help the party of Lincoln move once again closer to the spirit of Lincoln," he said.

In another sign of his awkward transition from soldier to author to prominent Republican, Powell would not promise to back the 1996 GOP nominee, saying he wanted to watch the campaign unfold. Nor did he rule out voting for President Clinton next year.

Stafford Loan Program may return due to cap

James Dierking

staff reporter

More than 1 million college students who received loans with the new federal direct-lending program might have to go back to the Stafford Loan Program next year.

According to Wednesday's Congress Daily, a newsletter for the U.S. House and Senate, the education committee has agreed to cap the William D. Ford Federal Direct Lending Program at 10 percent.

"What I think they're saying by capping it at 10 percent is that they're still willing to consider it," said Larry Moeder, director of financial aid.

Almost 20 percent of the K-State loan volume and 40 percent of the national loan volume is now through federal direct lending.

Students with federal direct loans receive their loans directly from the government and bypass banks, guarantee agencies and other middlemen that make up the Stafford Loan Program.

Most students and schools approve of the direct-lending program because it decreases paperwork and allows students to get loans faster than with the Stafford Loan Program.

But officials think the cut would be focused on smaller schools and not K-State.

"Right now any publicly subsidized institution has been eligible for direct lending. So they'll probably start pulling back from com-

SGA selects new interim coordinator

The University has selected an interim coordinator and adviser for Student Governing Association.

Kelley Fink, health educator at Lafene Health Center, will begin working part-time in the Office of Student Activities and Services Monday.

"The starting date is not determined yet," Fink said.

Fink replaces Tricia Nolfi, who will be leaving to take another job Friday.

Fink will be working at Lafene and in OSAS until the end of the semester. Fink said she had a couple of projects she needed to finish at Lafene before she could take on the activities coordinator position full-time.

"My first job will be to gain an understanding of what services are being provided," Fink said.

She said she saw her role as one of transition. She said she would be helping the students with the transition between Nolfi and a new permanent director.

Fink said she would be working with Lisa Heath, graduate assistant in OSAS, and Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, in advising student government and overseeing the services in OSAS.

"She and I are planning on doing a collaborative effort," Fink said. "Bernard Franklin will also have more of a role in advising the groups. I see it as

Union must comply with ADA codes

Chris Oakley

staff reporter

The K-State Student Union will have to meet current fire and Americans with Disabilities Act codes as a part of its enhancement project.

Because of a grandfather clause for existing structures, the Union has not been subject to the new codes, said Jack Sills, senior associate director of the Union.

Architect Ken Ebert of the Ken Ebert Design Group, the firm working on the enhancement project, said meeting these codes was necessary in any new construction.

"Codes constantly change," he said. "Often times, they become more strict."

Ebert said the Union did not need to comply with ADA or fire codes for new structures.

"That doesn't mean that it is unsafe," he said.

Sills said the codes did not necessarily pose a delay to the project.

"We are certainly looking at the codes to make sure that we do not miss anything," he said.

Sills said there were stairways at the Union that did not have proper flow, which could present a problem for people with wheelchairs.

The north and south Union entrances are accessible to wheelchairs, and elevators help in accessing the upper levels, Ebert said.

Ebert said renovations would include installing levers instead of doorknobs and making entrances to rooms more accessible.

Other measures will be taken to ensure the building complies with new fire codes.

"One of the main things that we will be looking at is automatic fire sprinklers throughout the building," Ebert said.

The initial design phase for the renovation, which Ebert said should take about 11 months, has already begun.

"We are going through initial code review and exploration. The Union has been examining whether the food service will be in-house or contracted out," Ebert said.

In early December, design consultants with RTK Architects from Los Angeles will be in the Union to work on the design. RTK architects are working with the Ken Ebert Design Group on the Union project.

State employees affected by new, efficient hiring system

Janie Willey

staff reporter

A new hiring system that will affect all state employees will be in place by Dec. 18, Kim Bowker, manager of employment services for Human Resources, said at a Classified Women's Caucus Thursday.

The Human Resource Information System, which is a skills matched system, will require interested state applicants and current employees to fill out a registration form listing the person's skills, she said.

"The new system is going to be pre-ty exciting. A lot of the things that we have hoped for will be on the new system," Bowker said.

Information gathered on the forms will be stored in a computer file, and opening positions will be matched with applicants who have the required skills for the job and show interest in the opening.

The registration forms for current employees and interested applicants will be filled out only once, Bowker said.

The forms list several skills areas and levels of proficiency a person can mark.

The new hiring system will also require interested applicants to find out about opening positions themselves, Bowker said.

The old system required Human Resource Services to send out lists of opening positions to all employees looking for a transfers, promotions and other applicants.

Bowker also said the new system will eliminate the civil-service test that has been administered to all state position applicants for many years.

The current system requires employees to fill out an application for any job that a person wants, and the new system only requires applicant to express interest in an opening, Bowker said.

"As far as the employment process, we found there were lots of barriers to employment," Bowker said.

The old process required several forms to fill out and was too cumbersome for applicants or employees wishing to apply for a new job, she said.

"I think it's more straightforward. I think it's worth a chance. I think there needs to be a change," Dee Bammes,

Habitat for Humanity sponsors 8-band benefit concert

contributing writer

Habitat for Humanity's campus chapter will present a benefit concert beginning at 7 tonight at the Warehouse Opera House, featuring an entourage of eight local and regional bands.

The proceeds will go toward future house-building projects for needy Manhattan residents.

Included in the show will be Manhattan's Ultimate Fake Book, Back Porch Mary, Hobb's End, Coolerspoon and Smudge, a winner in Union Program Council's Opus band competition this year.

The remaining bands are Lawrence's Turquoise Sol, Level and 425 Main, another winner at Opus.

"It's a good deal that they are doing this for a really good cause and supporting local bands at the same time," said Mike Krug, guitarist for Back Porch Mary.

Contrary to some misconceptions, Habitat for Humanity does not give away houses indiscriminately.

Kevin Miller, president of the Manhattan Habitat affiliate, said the selection involved a lengthy application process. The houses are not presented on a silver platter.

"They're not just given to these families," Miller said. "They pay for the house at whatever the costs to make it over a 20-year mortgage with no interest, and they're required to put in a number of hours to volunteer."

"We help them keep their dignity because they are buying their own home. It's not something that's

CUSTODY RULING OVERTURNED

ANN ARBOR, Mich. (AP) — A woman who lost custody of her daughter to her ex-boyfriend for putting the little girl in day care while attending college regained custody Wednesday.

The state Court of Appeals overturned a judge's order that the girl be put in her father's care.

The appeals court sent the case back to the Circuit Court and told the lower court not to consider day care in deciding custody of 4-year-old Maranda Ireland Smith. It also ordered a different judge to hear the case.

Maranda had remained with her mother, 20-year-old Jennifer Ireland, all along while the judge's ruling was under appeal. The girl has been attending day care at the University of Michigan, where her mother attends classes.

"Just knowing that Maranda is going to stay with me, it's the best feeling that anyone could possible have," Ireland said.

Maranda's father, Steven Smith, 21, sued for custody in 1993, saying the girl would be better off with him because his own mother, a full-time housewife, could care for the child.

In 1994, in a ruling that outraged women's groups, Circuit Judge Raymond Cashen gave Smith custody, saying Maranda would be better off with Smith than with strangers.

INTERNATIONAL CENTER

Expansion plans to accommodate students' needs

Kimberly Hefling
staff reporter

A private conversation is virtually impossible in the offices of the International Student Center.

Large events like International Night cannot take place in the center because the facility is not large enough, nor is there enough cooking space.

In addition, the center is in need of an additional staff member to help with support work for the more than 1,000 international students on campus, but there is no place for this employee to work.

For these reasons, the center has plans to expand. If the center is able to earn the $250,000 necessary for the project and receives the necessary approval from the Kansas Board of Regents, the necessity will become a reality.

"Expansion is needed because in the past 10 years, there has been a significant increase in the number of international students," said Motaz Hourani, program coordinator at the foreign student office. "We need additional office space to provide better services and accommodate those who work here and provide those services."

The expansion will include two private offices, a conference room and a reception area.

"The current international center was built in 1977," Ruth Ann Wefald, co-chairman of the fund-raising campaign, said. "With just over 500 international students on campus, the center was very adequate to meet those students' needs."

Now, with about 1,100 international students, and sometimes their families, using the center, Wefald said the expansion was critical.

Although the official fund-raising campaign for the center probably will not begin until spring, during International Student Week, from $20,000 to $25,000 has already been collected mostly from international alumni, Hourani said.

The regents have already approved $50,000 for the project, but they must approve the additional funds needed before the campaign can begin.

The center provides a wide variety of services to K-State international students.

The office staff at the center assists students with U.S. immigration matters and documentation needed by students' home countries. In addition, the staff also provides assistance with personal and emergency needs visiting students and scholars might encounter, as well as help with recruitment and retention of international students.

"K-State is working toward the globalization of the campus," Hourani said.

"It's useless to recruit more international students and then not be able to support them."

Nabeeha Kazi, president of the International Coordinating Council, said the center not only helped support international students, but the whole University.

"It benefits the entire campus because the services offered are open to everyone," Kazi said. "It's called the International Center, but it's open to everyone. Students and even faculty and staff can have meetings in the International Center."

One challenge international students must face is planning multicultural nights. The center is not large enough to comfortably contain the 200 to 500 who might turn out for the events, nor does the facility have enough cooking space, Kazi said.

Although the K-State Student Union would be an ideal place for such events, food sanitation rules in the Union make it impossible to cook food at the location. As a result, the events usually take place at a location like the Manhattan Middle School, Kazi said.

"International Night is Nov. 18," Kazi said. "We're not forced to do it, but we're going to move the event off campus because we could have anywhere from 300 to 500 people turn out."

The night will include dinner and multicultural performances at Manhattan Middle School.

Conducting

Duties of musical director stressful, challenging

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

He's a mere shadow to the spotlight, but when the curtains rise on Nov. 16, the success of the entire show will be on his shoulders.

Although the costume crew, set constructors and even the director will be able to rest and enjoy the final product of their labors during "The Music Man" production, Musical Director Bill Wingfield's stress level will soar.

"As soon as the lights go down, the one person who has any control is the music director," said Paul Chang, senior in music education and assistant music director. "If anything falls apart, the director has to save the day."

Wingfield stands on a podium tall enough for both the orchestra members and actors to see him, but short enough that it is not obtrusive to the audience members.

He must cue the actors if they forget a line or a lyric so that he can keep the timing of the show on track. Not only does he have to know what's going on musically in the show, but he also must know the actor's lines so he can cue the orchestra to come in.

The 25 orchestra members have their own challenges to deal with as well.

"It's quite different than playing on a stage," Wingfield said. "It's hard to hear yourself because you're in the pit, and it's also dark and hard to see the director."

The members must be constantly alert so they will see the music director raise his hands for their cue to begin playing.

"The orchestra doesn't have a long break between songs," Chang said. "They have five to seven minutes at the most. They don't have time to sit and relax — they have to be attentive as well."

"In a professional setting, though, the members have done the production so many times that they don't have to be attentive. They may be reading a book, and they automatically know when to come in. But we don't have that luxury because we will only practice four times with the actual actors."

Because the orchestra and the actors will only meet four times to rehearse the production, Wingfield's job becomes particularly important. He must coordinate the orchestra's playing with the actors.

"I've never had any big disasters," Wingfield said. "Sometimes tempos start out too slow or fast. I usually number the measures, and if we get off, I yell out the measure so that we can all be in the same place. But the singers are well trained, so if they do get off, they can get back in quickly."

For the last two months the actors have practiced for three hours five nights a week, so "well-trained" is almost an understatement.

Jennifer Edwards, vocal coach and assistant professor in music, worked with the actors/singers intensely for the first two weeks, teaching them 234 pages of music before choreography was added. The musical features more than 15 musical pieces.

"The kids actually memorized the music for the whole show," Jennifer Edwards, vocal coach, said. "Then Luke began blocking the show and giving them their characterizations. You have something learned and memorized and can sing it, but when you put it to movement, you have to relearn it."

This process has been especially hard for the four actors in the barber shop quartet who sing a four-part harmony a cappella.

"They have to move together," Edwards said. "There's a lot of detail, finesse and nuance. In painting, nuance would come in shades of color, but in the quartet, it comes in changes in tempos, how phrases move in time, and detail in harmony."

Joel Krause, freshman in chemical engineering and member of the quartet, said the quartet was challenging because, unlike a choir member, quartet members cannot depend on someone else if they mess up.

Instead, they must listen closely to the other members of the quartet to find the correct pitch.

Not only must they focus on their sound, but they also have to stay in character the entire time.

"We're so worried that we're going to miss our pitch that we forget about our characters or dance steps," Krause said. "We're trying to make it so that it doesn't show we're worried."

In addition to the daily rehearsals, the quartet practices an additional three hours per week with Edwards.

"If we take a break, we lose what we built up during the previous week," Krause said. "We took three days off last week, and we were terrible. Everyone laughed. 'We deserved to be laughed at — we laughed at ourselves.'"

Chang said the audience should see only the finished product, without the mistakes, but sometimes this makes it difficult to appreciate the efforts that went into the product.

"If they would just think about how much time goes into writing a paper for a class," Edwards said. "It takes 10 minutes to read the paper, but just think about how much planning and work went into it."

"That's what this production is like for us."

General-education proposal poses questions

Although this proposal could potentially improve education at K-State, it will harm education unless it is properly implemented.

Faculty Senate and Student Senate are considering a proposal to implement 18 hours of general-education requirements for fall 1997 freshmen.

But there are a few unanswered questions to consider before supporting the proposal.

Is it going to increase class sizes?

Is it going to increase the cost of education at K-State?

Will it increase the number of students in classes that meet general-education requirements?

And if it increases the number of students in classes, does it truly increase the quality of the classes?

Will adding requirements increase the length of time needed for graduation for the average student?

We urge faculty and student senators to answer these questions before they consider implementation.

Although this proposal could potentially improve education at K-State, it will harm education unless it is properly implemented.

Once implemented, general-education courses would emphasize active learning, group activities and foster connections to other areas of thought.

The Kansas Board of Regents and North Central Accreditation Team are also putting pressure on the University to implement general-education requirements.

But colleges like Engineering and Architecture need more time than just one semester to rearrange curriculum.

Many colleges, like the College of Arts and Sciences, already require freshmen to take 18 hours of the equivalent of general-education courses.

But colleges like Engineering and Architecture are scraping to find more than three or four classes that meet general-education standards.

Instead, the University needs to investigate the details before implementation.

Choosing between two attitudes leads to

Accusations of racism

American society has painted itself into a corner.

There is a lot of talk on all sides about what, if anything, is wrong with American race relations today. Some of the discussion is productive, some of it destructive. Most of it is sincere.

The problem with race relations in America — and this applies to the American microcosm of K-State — is that there is no mutually acceptable solution to the problems that face us.

In fact, there isn't even agreement that problems exist. In spite of repeated examples of police brutality against minorities, the disproportionate number of minorities in the criminal-justice system (mostly for victimless crimes, no less), the burning anger and even racism within some segments of the black and Hispanic communities, and the continued lack of significant numbers of minorities in positions of power, some Americans refuse to believe there are serious racial problems in America.

Most Americans, thankfully, are intelligent enough to keep their heads out of the sand about the issue. That's where the diversity of opinion begins. The diversity of the opinions isn't what prevents social justice. The obstacle is instead that every possible solution is changed into a catch-22 because of that diversity.

Just for a moment, assume that a white person (a woman, for these purposes) wants to be as tolerant, respectful and egalitarian regarding other races as possible. This sounds noble. It's unfortunately impossible to do nowadays.

Suppose this white woman wants to assume people of color are no different than she is but are each individual human beings, as she is.

She'll be called a racist for not respecting the cultural and empirical traits of black and Hispanic people. After all, it's often said, black and Hispanic people are from unique cultures and have differing practices, priorities, tastes and experiences than whites.

Because she doesn't want to be considered a racist, suppose she chooses to believe people of color are distinctly and uniquely different than white people in an attempt to respect and tolerate these differences that are said to exist.

She'll be called a racist for this, too. She'll be called a racist because she's assuming that whites and other races are different.

Because she assumes they're different others will believe that "different" is a code word for "inferior." She'll probably be suspected of being a white separatist.

Suppose she supports affirmative action programs. In some people's judgment, she's a racist for doing so. Affirmative action is criticized for assuming people of color are somehow less able to achieve what whites do on their own without help from white people.

Maybe she scraps that idea and believes instead in meritocracy. She'll be called for her racist views if she does this because she'll be supporting a policy to exclude minorities from opportunities.

Let's imagine she meets a man of another race and decides to date him.

She'll be accused trying to destroy the racial group the man belongs to if she dates him.

She'll be called a racist for singling a man of color out to date and for believing in a Don Juan/Mandingo stereotype.

If, on the other hand, she refuses to date men of other races, she'll be called a racist for withholding her affection on the grounds of a person's race.

The poor woman has a pretty exasperating set of choices.

Minorities tend to approach race relations with a sense of frustration and anger because of how they've been ignored and disappointed for so many years. This is widely known and understood by many reasonable people.

Whites tend to approach race relations out of fear.

We're not necessarily afraid of people of other races in general. We simply fear being called the "R" word for trying to be good people.

Maybe more people should keep this fear in mind.

Evolutionists deny Jesus Christ

Recently, I got into a discussion with a friend about what she believes and why. In the course of our discussion, we ended up talking about where life began and how we got here.

Eventually, the answer to that question came down to two possibilities, as it almost always does: creation and evolution.

Naturally, we defended our respective positions well and knew from the start we were not going to change either of our world views. However, we enjoyed a good debate and went our separate ways.

This debate and the recent discussion about this issue caused me to ponder the issue deeply.

I recall that as I was going through junior high and high school, any discussion on this issue was followed by the teacher saying, "We are required by the state to teach evolution, no matter what we think."

This didn't bother me then because for some reason that statement made sense.

But it doesn't anymore. It strikes me as odd that one of the most important issues that should be considered by an individual when he is in the midst of creating his world view should be dismissed with the cursory statement, "We can't talk about anything but evolution."

In addition, when the student arrives at a public university, the stifling of debate doesn't stop there either. Once again, the response is, "We have to teach evolution," or "This is a state school; we can't talk about creation." As if these qualify for good reasons open debate cannot be had, most people simply nod and return to taking mass quantities of notes.

This makes me curious. If we are absolutely sure the only possible way life as we know it got here, why not let open discussion occur, and those who are fully knowledgeable about evolution can easily dispel all other theories as falsities?

The simple reason is that it can't be done. Evolution itself is full of holes. In fact, Charles Darwin retracted the whole idea before he died.

This is absurd in an educational system that will freely discuss sexual intercourse and distribute condoms but is reluctant to allow discussion on central issues such as these.

One of the most frequent responses to this issue is that creation cannot be discussed because religion cannot enter the schools. If this were true, nothing could be taught, even evolution.

Those that claim that evolution is correct are evolutionists who believe in the religion of evolutionism. Religion is nothing but a set of beliefs that guides a person in his actions, and evolution is no different than anything else.

The simple fact is that there will be religion taught in schools. The question is, which one will it be?

For those of you that don't believe evolution is a religion, why do you defend it so staunchly if it won't shake your entire world view if criticized? Why are you so upset when someone supports creation?

I do not become defensive when someone challenges my theory that UFOs don't exist because it doesn't matter.

However, evolution is a different story for those that depend on it to be true.

As for evolution itself, I ask three simple questions.

First, where did the universe and all that is come from in the first place? Secondly, are you really ready to believe that time and pressure working on an enormous ball of gas could result in the complexity of the human ear and the oddity of the giraffe? Finally, are you confident that man is a soulless animal?

For this is what evolution comes down to.

It is a response to fill in the hole that is left when an individual chooses not to believe in Jesus Christ. It has become a piece to fill in one of the holes when that occurs.

This is why those who hold to evolution defend it so strongly.

It is the fragile piece that holds their world view together.

► POWELL'S APPEAL

Editor,

Jason Hamilton — your argument regarding Colin Powell was a little bit premature, wasn't it?

Let's look at it in a different light.

1.) Does the man have handlers? Hell, yes. You show me one politician without someone who's a "groomer" or a "suck up," and I'll show you someone who hasn't got a prayer.

2.) Is he an insider? Absolutely. He has worked in the government so long they might as well be family.

3.) Is likability good policy? Here's where we disagree. Your argument boils down to this — he's likable, but what's he going to do? I'd expect him to do jack.

And that's not a bad thing. Eisenhower had very few accomplishments, but people loved him. And they thought the world of him. He didn't "rock the boat" or change policy, he just made people happy.

Bad politics? No. Bad policy? Well, it's often perceived doing nothing is bad policy, but if you've ever played Sid Meir's Civilization, you know that sometimes it's to your advantage.

If the people are happy, they work harder and support the government and charities more, etc. America may need new policy — but it also needs for the masses to believe the government is made of "good people" and not scum.

I'm not in favor of Powell as of yet, as he has yet to say if he will run (I think not) but his asset would be: "People like me and believe I'm a good guy." The media today won't allow for that.

In the '50s and before, they wouldn't print that someone had mistresses, was crippled, etc. But today, no holds barred. So people may never like the government again as long as they know too much. Kinda like knowing what's in a hot dog.

► BLACK HISTORY

Tulsa riot omitted from history books

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Blacks have a legacy that is not being taught in history books, Author Ron Wallace told more than 70 people Wednesday.

Information about the Tulsa race riot was omitted from history books, keeping most Americans ignorant of the mass destruction that occurred in the Greenwood community of Tulsa, Okla.

The Ku Klux Klan attacked Greenwood on June 1, 1921. The community was the only U.S. city in history to be bombed.

Wallace said he learned of the Tulsa race riot tragedy just five years ago after speaking with an 89-year old historian.

Greenwood was nicknamed Black Wall Street by the New York Stock Exchange because of the wealth it had as a black community, Wallace said.

"They built business and community so prosperous it was a rival to anywhere," Wallace said.

Black Wall Street, also known as Little Africa, was a community within itself.

The 15,000 residents were wealthy blacks who lived within an isolated society with its own theaters, banks and libraries.

Jim Crow laws, which required blacks to stay indoors after 6 p.m. every night, forced them to construct a close knit blanket of kinship and strength, Wallace said.

Although burning the midnight oil indoors, blacks continued to build their prosperous community by networking among themselves and with Jewish merchants.

"We did not come from slavery, but from a proud culture," Wallace said.

U.S. history is flawed because Americans have learned black history is only about slavery and civil rights, Wallace said.

Today, only a small percentage of people cause racial chaos, he said.

"Eighty percent of Americans don't care what color people are," Wallace said.

Freeman M. Davis II, coordinator of K-State's Office of Multicultural Affairs, said anytime an ethnic group has had an effect on society, their achievements have been neglected or simply omitted.

"If we had no significant impact, then it was recorded," Freeman said.

Wallace Gary, sophomore in secondary education, said he felt it was important to talk about blacks' successes.

"Anytime black people want to get together to do something positive, it's worth being talked about and exposed," Gary said.

"We're the only culture in America that has had its infrastructure systematically destroyed."

"Black Wall Street: A Lost Dream" was sponsored by the Multicultural Student Council, the Native American Student Body, American Ethnic Studies, KSU Hillel, K-State Multicultural Affairs Office and the Department of History.

Wallace took book orders and said he would cover Black Wall Street again at 6:30 tonight at the University of Kansas' Spencer Museum of Art.

A movie about Black Wall Street will probably be released within a few years, Wallace said.

► MEDICAL SCHOLARSHIPS

Program's worth evaluated

Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Legislature will decide next year whether to continue a medical scholarship program designed to steer doctors toward underserved areas, one some critics said is ineffective.

The Special Committee on Ways and Means adjourned a hearing Tuesday without making any recommendation, but it wants the University of Kansas Medical Center to develop some options for financing the program when the Legislature meets in January.

Some members of the committee suggested the Legislature should try to tap new sources of money for the program, such as private, non-profit health organizations.

The program is part of the state's effort to provide medical services to rural areas. Some officials believe the doctor shortage in rural areas encourages people in small towns to move to larger cities, where they do not have to travel as far to see a physician.

The program permits the state to forgive loans for medical school if the recipients work in an underserved area.

Senate delays abortion vote

■ Late-term abortions difficult to discuss, vote on

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Abortion-rights lawmakers delayed Senate action Wednesday on a proposed late-term abortion ban until hearings are held on the procedure that even supporters find difficult to discuss.

After two days of pressing for a vote on the ban, opponents of the so-called "partial-birth abortion" consented to a Judiciary Committee review on the advice of Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan.

"Sen. Dole and I have discussed this and while neither one of us thinks this is necessary, we do think it may not be a bad idea in that the more one learns about this horrible procedure the harder it is to defend it," said Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H., sponsor of the ban bill.

His concession made what could have been a narrow victory for abortion-rights advocates a nearly unanimous 90-7 vote to give Judiciary the next 19 days in which hold hearings. The seven votes in opposition were all cast by Republicans.

There is no question about the chilling effect of this medical procedure. It is something that has to be understood thoroughly on all sides.

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER, R-PENN.

The call for hearings was led by Pennsylvania's Sen. Arlen Specter, a Republican presidential candidate who supports abortion rights.

"There is no question about the chilling effect of this medical procedure," said Specter, a Judiciary Committee member. "It is something that has to be understood thoroughly on all sides."

The first hearing will be Nov. 17, Judiciary Chairman Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, announced later Wednesday.

The procedure in question is rare, used only when the mother's life is in grave danger, abortion-rights advocates said.

However, since it is done in late in the second-trimester or third-trimester, the doctor collapses the skull so the fetus can be vaginally removed intact without damaging the mother.

Smith described it as "grisly" and "disgusting" and spoke of how doctors sucked the brains from the fetus to collapse the skull. Further review was unnecessary, he said, because the House held a day of hearings before it passed the bill, 288-139, last week.

But Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., argued that questions raised about the technique deserved explanation by medical experts.

"If the procedure is being abused, then we should consider restricting it, but it's unclear if it is being abused," he said.

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, who supported hearings, said she was disturbed about the misinformation floating around about this bill and told senators, "We are not voting on whether or not certain medical procedures can be described in grisly details."

The Clinton administration says the bill is unconstitutional because it would ignore a 1992 Supreme Court ruling favoring a woman's health and life over any government restrictions on abortion as guaranteed in the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision.

The bill would exempt abortions performed by Caesarean section or hysterectomy or when the fetus dies before removal through the birth canal. However, it would impose a two-year prison term and fines on any doctor who partially delivers the living fetus before killing the fetus and completing the delivery.

A doctor also would be liable for civil damages if sued by the woman's family.

The bill provides, however, that an acceptable defense during court proceedings would be that the procedure was necessary to save the mother's life. The Justice Department said, however, that this provision was insufficient to guarantee protection for the mother's health.

If the procedure described in the bill were outlawed, a woman whose pregnancy might disable or kill her would be forced to choose a type of abortion that could be more dangerous, Andrew Fois, the assistant attorney general for legislative affairs, said in a statement.

Two years ago, Iowa State derailed the Wildcats' shot at a second-place finish in the Big 8. Read Friday's Collegian to see whether the Cyclones have what it takes to do it again.

PREP STANDOUT TO PLAY FOR CATS

Sara Munson, one of Kansas' top high-school girls basketball players last year, has joined the Wildcat basketball team. Munson was heavily recruited as a prep standout but originally opted to attend K-State solely as a student, forgoing a collegiate basketball career. Munson averaged 19.4 points and 7.5 boards while hitting 62 percent from the field as a senior helping the Junction City Bluejays to a 23-2 record and a third-place finish in the 6A State Tournament.

Nicole's guide to Big 8 basketball

Before you waste any money on this year's college basketball guides, you might want to read this first. I've already spent $5 on one of these worthless guides. And after reading it, I wished I'd purchased a Cosmopolitan instead.

After turning to the Big 8 predictions page, I was shocked to see where the Wildcats were ranked. The basketball guide I bought had K-State ranked seventh in the Big 8. Bewildered and thinking it must have been a typo, I thumbed through a couple of other magazines. Yet another guide ranked us seventh while another one had us in the conference cellar.

Aside from the one magazine that had the Cats in last place, all of the conference predictions from the so-called "experts" were identical. They predict Kansas finishing first in the league, followed by Missouri, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Oklahoma State, Colorado, K-State and Iowa State.

After reading that list, I decided to stick with my own preseason predictions. Although my top three teams are the same as the others, I think the rest of my predictions are more accurate than those in any preseason magazines — and what's more, they're free. So keep that $5 in your pocket, and refer to the following economical, accurate guide to Big 8 basketball. It's Poell's Preseason Predictions, and you can only find them here.

No. 1 — This was a toss-up between KU and Missouri. Although Mizzou will be the Jayhawks' toughest conference opponent, I have this feeling KU will ultimately prevail. I mean, who did KU lose from last year's team? The Big O, Greg Ostertag, which isn't a huge loss. Scot Pollard should fill that hole easily. Throw in Raef LaFrentz, Jacques Vaughn and Jerod Haase, and you've got another Big 8 championship for the Hawks.

No. 2 — Missouri. The Tigers not only have scary Norm Stewart at the helm, but they also return the 7-foot Haley twins. Although these two looked terrible at the beginning of last season, they improved significantly with each game. Also back for the Tigers is Kelly Thames, the conference freshman of the year two seasons ago before knee surgery took him out of last year's starting lineup. Add the team's best rebounder and team leader Julian Winfield to the picture, and you've got a team that could give KU a run for the title.

No. 3 — Oklahoma. There's one reason OU will finish this high in the league again — Ryan Minor. Minor, the league's Player of the Year last season, is even more threatening after spending all summer working on basketball instead of baseball. Look for Ernie Abercrombie, Dion Barnes and Tyrone Foster, a first-team junior-college All-American, to effectively support and protect Minor.

No. 4 — Oklahoma State. Sure the Cowboys lost Big Country Bryant Reeves and Randy Rutherford, but Eddie Sutton is one of the league's premier coaches who took his sleeper squad of last year (that K-State beat) all the way to the Final Four. Although it's impossible to replace Reeves, the Pokes will get some rebounding help from forward Jerome Lambert, who led the nation in rebounding two years ago while at Baylor, and Maurice Robinson, a big Florida State transfer.

No. 5 — K-State. Surprise you? It should. Coach Tom Asbury landed some sizable recruits, including Gerald Eaker, Johnnie Williams and Manny Dies. That should help the Cats' inside game and free up Tyrone Davis. Transfer Anton Hubert should be a shooting threat, along with Mark Young, who showed flashes of brilliance last year. Questionable for K-State is point guard Elliot Hatcher, who ran most of the offense last year. After more surgery this summer, Cat fans will have to wait and see how Hatcher's knee responds to playing basketball again.

No. 6 — Nebraska. Sure, the Huskers have six seniors returning to the program, including Jaron Boone and Erick Strickland, two of the best defenders in the league. But there have been problems between the players and Coach Danny Nee, which contributed to last year's season-ending slide when Nebraska went 4-10 in league play. If those problems aren't resolved this year, the Huskers could take another tumble.

No. 7 — Colorado. Talk about overrated. The primary reasons the Buffs are ranked so highly in most polls is the acquisition of freshman Chauncey Billups and Georgia Tech transfer Martice Moore. Moore was the ACC Rookie of the Year in 1993, but Billups is just a freshman. With no seniors on the team, it will be too difficult for the Buffs to live up to high expectations this year.

No. 8 — Iowa State. It really pains me to put one of my favorite schools in the cellar, but I'm being realistic. The Cyclones lost the core of last year's NCAA Tournament team — Fred Hoiberg, Loren Meyer and Julius Michalik. Whom do they have left? Jacy Holloway. The Cyclones can only pray for some Hilton Coliseum Magic if they want to win a game this year.

The theme for last night's volleyball match was "Lick KU," and the K-State team did just that.

K-State came away with the victory after sweeping the Jayhawks 15-12, 15-9 and 15-5 in front of an attendance record-setting 4,271 fans packed into Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats are now 4-6 in the Big 8 and 18-8 overall.

With the loss, Kansas falls to 1-9 in the conference and 8-17 overall.

It was not an easy victory for the Cats. At times, the team was behind the Hawks, at times they were running even, and sometimes they were leaps ahead. The fact is they just were not consistent.

But in the end, Coach Jim Moore said he was pleased with his team's performance.

"I'm not disappointed. I really feel that for the first time in their careers, when they had to turn it up, they did," Moore said. "We didn't play really well, and we didn't execute well, but they did good overall. Our goal was to play well enough to stay at a high level."

Wednesday night's performance showed that even when the coaching staff makes an error, the team must still respond positively. Responding positively is something the Cats have had to learn this season.

"We, the coaching staff, made a subbing mistake," Moore said. "And I take full responsibility for that. But the girls responded well, and I think that just proves that we have learned some good things throughout the year."

Wednesday night also showed the team has been learning on an individual level.

With the victory, sophomore setter Devon Rynning added another 34 set assists to her record book. She has 1,178 assists this season, setting a new K-State single-season set-assist record.

"I am so pleased with the way she has progressed," Moore said of Rynning. "A year and a half ago, she had never really set at all. She's worked real hard and deserves everything she gets. She probably hasn't gotten everything she deserves."

With the advent of the Big 12 next year, Moore said he envisions real possibilities for Rynning in the new conference.

"Nebraska is losing their setter, Texas is losing theirs, and Texas A&M is losing their setter," Moore said. "She has a chance to be the best setter in the Big 12 next year."

Rynning said the Kansas match was the dawn of a new era for the Cats.

"We're still working hard, but today is the start of a brand new season," Rynning said. "We're building our confidence, and we've just decided we're going to get it done."

Rynning is modest when discussing her new record.

"Just another day's work," she said. "I just get done what needs to be done."

The Cats' defense held the Kansas offense to .133, .071, and .120 hitting efficiency in each of the three games. Kansas managed only 28 team kills on the match.

In comparison, the Cats did not perform phenomenally themselves. In game one, they hit for .000, improving to a mere .167 for game two.

Halftime must have done wonders for K-State as they came back and hit a solid .391 in the third game.

The Cats were led by seniors Jill Dugan, swing hitter, and Debbie Miller, middle blocker, in their last performance in front of a home crowd. Also key to the victory were junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk and freshman hitter Kim Zschau.

Dugan led the team defensively with 11 digs, hitting .053. She also had one solo block and two block assists. Offensively, Dugan had seven kills and one service ace.

Kate DeClerk and Kim Zschau come together for a block in K-State's victory against Kansas Wednesday night. The Wildcats defeated the Jayhawks 3-0.

Miller had seven kills, three digs, and a team-high four block assists. She hit for .222 hitting efficiency.

DeClerk had seven kills, hitting .308. She also contributed five digs, one solo block and three block assists.

Newcomer Zschau showed that she can hit consistently with a team high eight kills for the night as she hit .217. Zschau also had five digs and one block assist.

With only three more matches before the Big 8 and NCAA tournaments, the Cats are in a battle for fourth place in the conference.

The team travels to Missouri Sunday afternoon to take on the Tigers. Missouri, which is 1-8 in the conference, lost at Colorado Wednesday night, 3-1.

Colorado is now 5-4 in the Big 8. K-State must win its remaining matches, including a win at Colorado, in order to have a chance to compete in the upcoming NCAA tournament.

To prepare for the matches, Moore is giving the team a rest, calling the break an emotional one.

"We're cutting down practices. If we haven't learned it by now, we're not going to," he said. "There's no sense to running them into the ground."

"Everybody's tired, and you have to stay focused. You need emotional breaks."

Emotion of NCAA loss motivates Tigers

Chris May
staff reporter

The second round of the 1995 NCAA tournament is still on the minds of the Missouri Tigers.

A final-second loss to the eventual champions, the UCLA Bruins, is something the Tigers can't get out of their heads.

"There's not a day I don't think about it," senior guard/forward Julian Winfield said. "It was a lesson we learned, and it keeps us going."

The Tigers finished last season fourth in the Big 8 and have been picked No. 2 in the preseason conference poll.

The Tigers also have 10 letterwinners returning to the team. Among those 10, four are starters from last year: junior forward Derek Grimm, junior guard Jason Sutherland, senior forward/center Sammie Haley and Winfield.

Also returning to the Tiger lineup is 1993-94 starter sophomore forward Kelly Thames.

Thames was out last season because of a torn posterior cruciate ligament in his right knee. He has had surgery and will hopefully be 100 percent, Coach Norm Stewart said.

"I'm cautiously optimistic," Stewart said about Thames.

With the established veterans returning, the Tigers also have a handful of talented newcomers, led by Danny Allouche.

A 21-year-old freshman from Omer, Israel, Allouche came to Missouri after serving three years in the Israeli army, something Stewart said he saw as positive.

"We like him. We were looking for a shooter, and we like him because he could shoot the ball. He's done well in practice."

I've been impressed with his defensive, and he passes the ball well, too," Stewart said. "He's a nice young man, and he fits into our program easily."

With all the elements the Tigers have, the team is likely to find themselves in the NCAA tournament again. They might even end up with a Big 8 championship in the final year of the conference.

"It all depends on how well we practice," Winfield said. "We need to go into every game wanting to win. We have a lot more experience, and that will help our ball club."

Winfield has been working on his jump shot and said he felt like he did a good job of rebounding last year. His highest number of rebounds in a game was 18 against Iowa State last year.

Junior forward Derek Grimm was also positive about the Tiger outlook.

"With the experience and chemistry we have this season, we can do a lot more," Grimm said.

The last time the Tigers won a Big 8 championship was 1994, when they went 14-0 in the Big 8. The Tigers have made a trip to postseason play 28 times in the last 33 years. And for the last four straight years, they have made it to the NCAA postseason tournament.

With a record like that, it's no wonder Stewart, in his 29 years at Missouri, ranks fourth in victories among active coaches and is ninth overall.

Stewart and his staff combined bring more than 90 years of coaching experience to the Tiger team.

Stewart and his team meet with Coach Tom Asbury and the Cats on Jan. 27 in Manhattan and on Feb. 21 in Columbia.

Minor will be key to Oklahoma's season

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

While other teams in the Big 8 can go to any number of options on the offensive end of the floor, the success or failure of Oklahoma this season under second-year coach Kelvin Sampson depends on one player.

Ryan Minor. "I'll basically do the same things I did last year because I know this season, someone will be following me around, and I'll be a marked man," Minor said. "But, hopefully, I'll rise to the next level."

Last season, the Sooners were the surprise of the Big 8, going 23-9 overall and 9-5 in the Big 8. Minor led the way offensively, averaging 23.6 points a game by shooting near 50 percent from the field. Minor garnered Co-Player of the Year recognition by the Big 8 coaches and was tabbed a third-team all-American by several publications.

This season Minor, a six-foot, five-inch senior, was voted preseason Big 8 Player of the Year by a resounding margin.

Minor said he was looking to improve his numbers this season because for the first time, he concentrated solely on basketball during the summer instead of playing baseball.

"I feel a lot better because I'm coming into the season in better shape," Minor said. "Last year, I had to work myself into shape during preseason practice."

But the Sooners won't be able to win many games in the guard-dominated Big 8 this season without some help in the paint. "The amazing thing about last year's team was that we won 23 games by shooting jump shots," Sampson said.

Oklahoma won't need Minor-type numbers from the inside players, but it will need solid defense, plenty of rebounds and the occasional bucket. Ernie Abercrombie, Jason Yanish and Bobby Joe Evans will all need to produce. And Sampson has said he thinks they can.

Last season, Abercrombie averaged 11 points and six rebounds a game, even when playing against opponents who were several inches taller.

Evans comes to Norman after a stellar career at McKinney High School in Texas. As a senior, Evans, a bruiser at 6'9", 255 pounds, averaged 21 points and 16 rebounds.

"Our inside player has gotten much better," guard Dion Barnes said. "We have bigger guys this year, so that will help. The play of our big guys is going to determine how far we go this year."

In situations where the inside players aren't producing, Minor can still be called on for extra points.

"It helps a lot, knowing Ryan is the scorer he is," Barnes said. "It opens other people up for shots, too, which this year will be a big help because anyone can have a big night for the Sooners. We have a lot of offense."

Last season's premature exit from the NCAA tournament at the hands of Manhattan has become a motivating factor in the preseason.

"It's been inspiration for us," Barnes said. "We had to use the loss as a stepping stone for this year. This year, we expect to go out and do it, whereas last year, we didn't expect to go out and do it. It's not pressure, though."

In the preseason Big 8 poll, the majority of voters placed the Sooners third, behind Kansas and Missouri.

"We're not an elite team, not even a great team, but we're solid," Sampson said. The Sooners open the season next week against Jackson State in the Pre-Season NIT.

OU travels to Manhattan Jan. 9 and plays host to the Cats Jan. 20.

Read the Collegian next Thursday for previews of Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma State basketball.

Smatterings

by Scott Allen Miller

In America, they'd just make you serve detention

A School Dinners restaurant franchise in Belfast, Northern Ireland has been denied the ability to operate because it offers what a judge has deemed as entertainment, which violates the terms of its lease. The London chain of restaurants offers food served by waitresses in English schoolgirl uniforms embellished with short skirts and black stockings. The schoolgirl waitresses also wield whips to spank patrons who don't finish their food. Belfast councilman Sandy Blair supports the restaurant and allowed himself to be photographed getting a spanking from a waitress. Smatterings plans to investigate if the School Dinners chain would hire a schoolboy waiter with experience in college journalism.

Yet another possible Elvis sighting ... or not

Recent photo images of a 6-trillion-mile cloud of stellar gas taken by the Hubble Space Telescope prompted calls to CNN after the network broadcast them. Viewers claimed they could see an image of the face of Jesus in a cloud when the picture was turned sideways (presumably these viewers were watching CNN while lying on the couch). ABC, CBS, NBC, NASA headquarters in Washington and the Johnson Space Center all told the Associated Press they had received no such calls. An even more amazing fact about all this is no one knows exactly what Jesus looked like. The oldest known image of Jesus shows him as a black man, not a white or yellow cloud. Smatterings has examined the photo and determined the image is either of the Buddha, Elvis or Jimmy Hoffa.

Political diarrhea squirts K-State's backside

K-State was littered with anti-Semitic, anti-Clinton, anti-abortion, anti-liberal propaganda earlier this week. The posters were signed the Heartland Revolutionary Guard and appeared on bulletin boards across campus. Although many people are curious about who is in this guard, none are more curious than Republicans, who are now scrambling to recruit a member of the guard to run for Congress.

We hate to clean up feces, and it shows

Some strange things happened on a recent United Airlines flight from Buenos Aires to New York. Flight attendants refused to serve more alcohol to an investment banker from Connecticut because they believed he was intoxicated. He allegedly shoved a flight attendant out of drunken anger. To display his contempt for the whole situation, the banker allegedly dropped his drawers and heaved a log on a food-service cart, then wiped himself with some linen napkins. The banker has been charged with assaulting and intimidating a flight attendant, as well as interfering with a flight crew, charges he denies.

Hey ... there's not a phone in this coffin

Robert Joe Moody might be a loony bird, but he's honest. He's on trial for killing two women in Tucson, Ariz. He said space aliens forced him to use cocaine and kill them. In spite of this — um — reasoning, he has been declared mentally competent to stand trial and be his own lawyer. He has no qualms about paying the ultimate price for his crimes, either. In fact, he claims the aliens mandate he be executed so the aliens can resurrect him to speak through him. The jury agreed. The question on everyone's mind is how the aliens will speak to us when Moody is buried in a box behind the prison.

Making a Psychic connection

People are paying dollars a minute to hear phone psychics make predictions on their money, romances and careers

Their advertisements plague late-night television and the back pages of supermarket magazines.

They claim to have the key to your deepest financial and love dilemmas. Psychic hotlines promise answers, but they might be the biggest not-so-cheap-thrills of the night.

Equipped with a ripped-out page of psychic hotline numbers, some candles (to create that perfect mood) and my cordless phone, I set out to unveil the mystique behind this dark pastime.

From amongst the sea of ads, LaToya Jackson glared seductively, promising a passport to "love, happiness and success" at only $3.99 per minute. Who could resist calling her Authentic Psychic Network? I had to dial.

Before speaking to Leslie, the renowned, clairvoyant mystic who knows and sees all, a recorded voice informed me of the per-minute price and 18-and-over age requirement. I had five seconds to hang up and avoid being charged.

The first psychic I spoke to was Leslie. Her voice, much like her name, didn't sound all that mysterious. I wasn't quite yet ready to hear my own fate, so I opted to ask Leslie about her profession and credentials.

"I've been psychic all of my life," Leslie said, matter-of-factly. "I'm clairvoyant and clairaudio, which means that I can see pictures and hear answers."

The network is legitimate, Leslie insisted. All of the psychics are screened before becoming a part of LaToya's team. The screening involves giving the employer a reading to make sure the self-proclaimed psychic is the real thing.

Leslie said it was not difficult to make a connection with someone through the phone lines.

"I can pick up on their energy within 30 seconds," she said.

In fact, I later found out Leslie makes 15 to 20 connections per night. The calls last about 10 minutes, and around 70 percent of them are made by women.

"Women usually want to hear about career, finances and love," she said. "Ninety percent of men that call want to hear about relationships."

What do these psychics say to keep people on the phone for 10 minutes?

"We don't tell them negative things," she said. "We're not going to tell somebody that they're going to die."

"We tell them that their destiny is up to them," Leslie said, adding that predictions are true only as long as the person stays on the same path in life they are on when making the call. People always have the power to turn their lives around, she said.

Leslie, who works 15-20 hours a week at the hotline, also works as a private psychic and healer. She makes 30-70 cents per call, per minute. So each 10-minute call makes her $7 richer.

After revealing her income, I felt pretty confident she was ready to confide in me about her first psychic experience.

"I was 7 years old. We were in a hotel room, and something told me to go to the pool," she said, adding that she saw images of her sister drowning. "My powers saved my sister's life."

I wasn't expecting anything so intense. I couldn't very well argue with that revelation, so I decided to resume my psychic quest with another network.

Teresa, a 23-year-old psychic, answered my call at the "Live Personal Psychic" hotline and asked me a quick series of questions - name, birth date, last digits of my phone number, etc.

Teresa, who is clairaudio only, said she's had the power all her life. She first used it when she was 14.

"I got in trouble a lot with people thinking I was spying on them," she said. Friends, family and even teachers would often get suspicious upon hearing Teresa give accurate depictions of their lives.

The often-negative responses she's gotten from people have taught her a lesson, she said.

"I'm good about staying out of people's personal business. I don't spy on people, and I don't bring up what they don't want to discuss."

Unlike Leslie, Teresa said it takes her 10-15 minutes just to make the connection with a caller. Only after this personal connection is made can she answer any of the caller's more pressing questions.

"If they want a five-minute reading, they can call LaToya's hotline," she said.

At $2.97 per minute, a 15-minute connection was a $44.55 ordeal. For that amount, you could ask someone you're interested in out to dinner and start on some connections of your own. You could also get a membership to a pretty decent gym, and instead of agonizing over the future, you could get your present self in shape.

I was surprised to hear there was a 90-minute limit on the phone call.

"After 90 minutes, people tend to not want to pay their phone bill," Teresa said.

Does the vast number of hotlines available on the market bother her? How could there be so many psychics out there?

"I personally believe everybody has a psychic ability," she said. "They just need to utilize it. Personally, I have no way of knowing if all of the hotlines are legitimate. But I know mine is the real thing. I wouldn't work for it if it wasn't. I wouldn't want that sort of karmic death."

Hmmm, shouldn't an all-knowing psychic be able to tell whether the others were frauds? Sounded kinda shift, but I let it slide.

Teresa admitted there was a catch to her powers.

"I can't help myself," she said. "I can't look into my own life. My guides won't let me use it for personal gain. I have to use it to change things for the better."

After speaking to a more psychic, I was still skeptical but ready to embark on a little supernatural adventure of my own.

I decided to let the psychic forces guide me to the psychic network that would be right for me. Closing my eyes, I whirled my finger in the air and let it land on a random ad.

"My psychic helped my relationship so much, I invited her to my wedding," read the ad for MorningStar Psychics. I dialed.

"Hello, my name is Sorsha," my psychic said. Yes, I thought, finally a name worthy of a psychic.

Sorsha asked me the routine preliminary questions, then offered me a choice of an automatic tarot card reading or the opportunity to ask questions.

"I'd like to find out if I should go to grad school or join the work force?" I asked slyly, already sure of my decision to get a job.

"What I'm seeing is that you haven't

Residence hall lock-in to replace canoe races

James Dierking
staff reporter

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls will be locking up its residents Saturday night at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"It's a great way to meet people, go out and have a good time and just get out of the residence halls," said Andrea Hammeke, junior in agribusiness and Boyd Hall social chair.

All residents are invited to the lock-in, which will include a dance, games, refreshments, movies and basketball and volleyball tournaments.

"We're offering a lot of different activities. There will be something for everyone," Rene Grant, ARH social chair, said.

All residence hall members can attend the event free, but guests must pay a $3 fee that will then allow them to attend other ARH events this school year.

"This is the first event the $3 fee will be implemented. If residents have guests, they can call me, and I'll get their name put on the roster," said Grant, graduate student in community and regional planning.

The lock-in begins at 11 p.m. Saturday and will last until 3 a.m.

► SMOKING

Nicotine may help treat diseases

DURHAM, N.C. (AP) — Scientists considering possible beneficial aspects of nicotine arrived Wednesday for a tobacco company-backed conference, still firm, however, in their conviction that smoking is dangerous.

"Cigarette smoking presents a whole host of toxic substances and cancer-causing chemicals," said Jed Rose, director of the Center for Nicotine Research.

But Rose said nicotine by itself could have some effects on the brain that might yield new treatments for problems like attention-deficit disorder and Alzheimer's disease.

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. contributed $15,000 to buy airline tickets and lodging for out-of-town scientists giving presentations at the meeting, hosted at Duke University, which itself was built in part with tobacco money.

Rose's laboratory is located in the Sunday, but residents and their guests will be able to enter or leave throughout the night.

"They can come in any time they want to, but once they leave, they can't come back in," Grant said.

The event replaces the annual fall canoe races, which were canceled because of scheduling conflicts.

"We just didn't get the cooperation we needed from Tuttle Creek to have the races," Grant said.

But the spring canoe races are still being planned, Grant said.

"To replace the races, we brainstormed in a group with all the social chairs from all the residence halls and came up with something we thought everyone could enjoy," Hammeke said.

The residence hall points that would have been won at the canoe races will be earned according to the amount of help each residence hall has at the lock-in.

"Every hall has a particular job, and that's how we'll get our points," Hammeke said.

This is the first lock-in ARH has planned, and members are unsure about attendance.

"We really have no idea, but most ARH events bring in 300 or 400 people," Grant said.

► CITY COMMISSION

City considers truck route; parking guidelines

Cori Cornelson
staff writer

Semi truck drivers might have to change their driving and parking habits when doing business in Manhattan.

City commissioners are in the planning stages of redrafting two ordinances that would establish a truck route and set guidelines of where semi truck drivers can park.

At Tuesday night's city commission meeting, commissioners outlined problems with the rough drafts of the ordinances and later decided to submit ideas to city staff members so they could compile data.

The proposal came after people expressed concerns about safety and wear on roads.

City Attorney William Frost said there was a practical problem with the first ordinance, which would prohibit the parking of certain types of trucks in residential areas.

There is no specific law governing semi truck parking in Manhattan.

He said it might be difficult to enforce any parking regulations for semi trucks.

He said semi truck drivers might be from out of state and never pay the fines.

Commissioner Sydney Carlin said one idea for enforcing parking violations was to wheellock semi trucks that have multiple unpaid fines.

"We might have to go to that kind of enforcement if someone ignores a fine or citation," she said.

Frost said the problem with wheellocks was that they do not solve the problem.

"That tends to keep the vehicle there instead of moving it," he said.

Alvin Johnson, director of Riley County Police Department, said there were a number of problems with wheellocks.

He said separate ordinances were required for wheellocks, as well as liability concerns and the need for separate trucks to haul the wheellocked trucks.

"It's something you should look at very closely before making a decision," he said.

Acting City Manager Ron Fehr said another alternative that might be appropriate would be to limit parking to one side of the street.

Commissioner Steve Hall said one potential problem with semi truck parking occurred during yearbook sales on campus.

He said that if emergency vehicles had to respond to a fire on campus during yearbook sales, there would be a problem.

Vaughn Murphy, a Manhattan semi truck driver for 20 years, said if the city wanted to solve the parking problem in the city, then it needed to provide a place for the truckers to park.

He said the city desperately needed a truck stop.

"You need to provide a place to park near food, fuel and a motel," Murphy said.

He said the city didn't need a big top for truckers because there were usually not more than 20 semi trucks in Manhattan overnight.

The second ordinance, which would establish truck routes within the city, also has problems with how the term "truck" is defined, as well as the enforceability, Frost said.

Bruce McCallum, director of public works, said the classification of trucks primarily dealt with weight-carrying capacity.

He said the typical city dump truck weighed 28,000 to 30,000 pounds. He said Riley County dump trucks are somewhat bigger. Most trash trucks weigh more than 40,000 pounds.

Hall said there probably wasn't a problem with city trucks because they were going to a particular destination.

Johnson said he thought there needed to be a clause in the truck-route ordinance that allowed exceptions for tractor trailers in parades and other activities.

Mayor Edith Stunkel said the city needed to concentrate on the needs of semi truck drivers and safety in neighborhoods.

"While we want to keep the truckers on an accessible route, we want our streets safer for children to cross," she said.

Hall said instead of having a number of different truck routes, the city should develop three north and south streets and three west and east streets.

Vaughn said he suggested the city get a truck driver to drive the proposed truck routes and see whether they were accessible.

► CARNEGIE HALL BAND

Jazz professor to tour with band in South America

Rebecca Schulz
staff reporter

Dennis Wilson, assistant professor of jazz studies, is leaving Manhattan for South America on a tour with the Carnegie Hall Band.

Wilson has been the lead trombonist for the band since 1992. The band, led by Jon Faddins, is touring South America from Nov. 10 to Nov. 22.

Before coming to K-State, Wilson did extensive work for the Count Basie Orchestra. He has also performed with jazz artists like Frank Sinatra, Ella Fitzgerald and Clark Terry.

"I have to go from time to time," Wilson said. "It allows me to stay fresh and on top of it."

The band is going to Montevideo, Uruguay; Cordoba and Buenos Aires, Argentina; and Santiago, Chile. Wilson said the band wanted to bring jazz to South America and to educate the people about jazz.

Through Wilson's continued alliance with Carnegie Hall, he said the band was coming to K-State next spring.

Aside from playing, the band will conduct clinics for the music department.

Wilson said he hoped the University could use this alliance with Carnegie Hall to attract students to K-State.

WEB SITE REVIEW

Have an e-laugh, check out comedy à la internationale

Darin Siefkes
contributing writer

It's that time of the year when everyone needs a laugh, so this week, we'll look at international comedy.

Absolutely Fabulous
(<http://www.cathouse.org/BritishComedy/AbsolutelyFabulous/>)

Those who don't receive the Comedy Channel can finally see the hilarious show "Absolutely Fabulous." The program focuses on a hippie who didn't make it out of the '60s and the struggles she has with her daughter, her best friend. This page brings all the Ab Fab resources on the Net together.

Various articles are included, written about Ab Fab so surfers can witness the British Finale of the show and offer insight on how Roseanne Barr is going to butcher it with her remake of the show.

This is a fabulous page to check out, darling.

The Young Ones
(<http://hammers.wwa.com/hammers/comedy/youngone/youngone.htm>)

Speaking of British Comedy, "The Young Ones" are on the Net and as funny as ever. The stories of Mike, Neil, Vyvan and Rick are out on the Web for all to see. For those who want to see what it's like to be haunted by a Poltergoose, or when mindless violence is even boring, check out the episode guide with the complete scripts of the entire TV show.

Surfers can also mourn the loss of the people's poet, with Rick's entire poem collection compiled to be savored.

The sounds include here are great, including the clip everyone dreads: "Open up, it's the pigs!"

All are easy to download, making this nothing less than an excellent page.

The Kids in the Hall
(<http://www.ms.utexas.edu/~barbarr/index.html>)
OK, they're not British, but the Kids in the Hall are funny.

The main feature of this page is the ability of users to hear "Kids in the Hall" stars Bruce McCulloch and Dave Foley with Real Audio. (Real audio is an application that allows users to hear sound files downloaded as the file reaches the computer instead of having to wait for the entire file to be downloaded.)

It also has links to the other "Kids in the Hall" resources on the Net.

Monty Python
(<http://bau2.uibk.ac.at/sg/python/monty.html>)
And, of course, there is Monty Python's Flying Circus. A complete episode guide is here to help surfers on along their ways.

A picture archive from the TV show and movies is an added bonus. Python's songs are available along with lyrics and chords to the infamous "Lumberjack Song" and "The Money Song."

Surfers should expect a wait when using this page because of Monty Python's popularity and because it is an overseas server.

► MENTAL HEALTH

State hospitals to close

■ Future of Topeka, Winfield institutions uncertain

Associated Press

TOPEKA — Now that the Hospital Closure Commission has given the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services two years to close down state hospitals in Topeka and Winfield, attention will turn to future uses for those two institutions.

Sen. Richard Rock, D-Arkansas City, told the commission Wednesday that Winfield had no interest in expanding a corrections facility that is already on the grounds of Winfield State Hospital.

He said the city would pursue a plan for building small apartment complexes to care for the most severe mental patients that will be leaving Winfield State — hoping to keep jobs for professional staff members now at the hospital.

Rep. Greta Goodwin, D-Winfield, called it an excellent, workable plan but said the state was going to have to help financially to make it work. Rock said the state must increase its reimbursement rate for caring for clients in the community for the Winfield conversion to succeed.

Jim Kaup, a spokesman for Topeka Mayor Butch Felker, told the commission the capital city already was working with state officials to plan for the transition of Topeka State Hospital, perhaps into a state office complex.

Rock said the proposal to keep a facility in Winfield for the most severely retarded was a potential model for other cities facing loss of state hospitals in the future as the state continues to move patients into community living.

"If this can be accomplished in Winfield for these most severe clients, the rest of this (reducing hospital capacity) should be a piece of cake," he said. "If this fails, it will impact all the rest of the closures."

Tucked into the commission's recommendations as it finished making its decisions Wednesday was this ominous warning to the five cities whose hospitals were spared the closing ax this time: "Planning should proceed to prepare for closing another hospital."

The commission heard during its four months of data collection that the policy of moving mental patients from hospitals to community living will continue to diminish the need for the institutions, and Kansas eventually is likely to have just one state hospital.

The five hospitals who escaped closure this time are located in Kansas City, Kan., Larned, Osawatimie, Parsons and Topeka.

The commission voted Wednesday to close Topeka State and Winfield State by Dec. 31, 1997, but declined to recommend alternative uses for the institutions after they are shut down. The vote was 9-1.

A motion to allow Winfield State to remain open an additional six months until June 30, 1998, failed on an 8-2 vote.

The motion to give Winfield extra time to close came after Rock outlined the plan for developing a community-operated program to care for severely mentally retarded and physically handicapped persons in Winfield.

Rock said Winfield needs 2-1/2 years to ensure success of its plan.

But a consultant working with city officials said it could be accomplished within the two years agreed upon by the commission, whose decisions are final unless the 1996 Legislature overturns them.

The consultant, Michael Strouse, executive director of Community Living Opportunities in Overland Park, said a detailed plan for Winfield should be completed by next month.

Instead of recommending to Gov. Bill Graves and the Legislature what the buildings at the two hospitals might be used for after they are closed, the commission suggested creation of a committee to study options presented to it during its nearly five months of work.

It suggested the committee include Lt. Gov. Sheila Frahm, who doubles as secretary of administration; Corrections Secretary Chuck Simmons; Youth Authority Chairman David Adkins, a state representative, and any other agency head Graves thinks should serve on it.

Prime among the options are to convert Topeka State into a office complex, relocating state agencies now renting space throughout Topeka to buildings on the hospital grounds, and enlarging the minimum security prison facility already located at Winfield State.

Jeff Wagaman, assistant secretary of the Department of Administration, told the commission Topeka State holds significant potential for consolidating state agencies.

He said a study was under way that would include consideration of using the hospital buildings for that purpose but no recommendation was ready at the time.

Simmons told the commission 290 minimum-security inmates already are at Winfield, and plans are in place to add 96 more. Winfield State could be converted into a minimum-to-medium security prison with 1,000 beds if need be, Simmons added.

However, Rock said Winfield had no interest in expanding the prison facility already on the hospital grounds and instead will pursue its plan to create small, community-operated apartment complexes with professional staff to care for patients who cannot go into community living.

► MAIL FRAUD

Responses to mail scam lead to arrest

Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — A man who gambled that sending bogus prize offers via certified mail would net him a bigger response faces federal charges after his arrest while picking up checks at a Little Rock mail drop.

Robert William Gordon III of Atlanta is accused of sending out 1,400 certified letters telling the recipients they won $50,000. To collect, recipients were told to sign a certificate and send a check for $39.

The scam drew a phenomenal 1,300 responses, including from people in Kansas and Missouri, some sent via overnight mail services, Arkansas Attorney General Winston Bryant said.

Authorities became involved when a North Carolina woman contacted Bryant's office last week to ask whether the prize was legitimate.

Investigators staked out the mail drop site, and authorities dressed as Mail Boxes Etc. employees arrested Gordon there Thursday without incident when he checked the box.

Gordon faced arraignment Tuesday in federal court in Little Rock.

Bryant said the arrest was notable because the suspect was caught before he could cash the estimated $50,000 worth of checks waiting for him. Investigators have not opened the mail but said that will happen as the case is prosecuted.

Had Gordon paid off everybody who responded, it would have cost him $65 million.

That the solicitation letters were sent via certified mail and contained an impressive looking winner's certificate helped lure people to respond, Bryant said. The mailing drew a 92-percent response.

Dave Sayer, spokesperson for Publishers Clearing House, said a 92-percent return on a direct-mail solicitation is mind-boggling.

"A lot of direct mailers are thrilled with 1 percent," Sayer said.

Gordon is being held as a federal prisoner at the Pulaski County Jail. He is charged with mail fraud, telemarketing fraud and use of fictitious identification. The telemarketing fraud charge stems from a new law that only requires the defendant to have the intent to defraud. So, though Gordon was caught before he could cash any checks, he can still be prosecuted, Bryant said.

The fictitious identification charge was made because Gordon allegedly rented the box under an alias, using a California driver license.

Bryant's office is filing a civil suit against Gordon for allegedly violating the Arkansas Deceptive Trade Practices Act.

Gordon didn't want to discuss his problems.

"You can talk to my attorney," Gordon said when contacted by telephone at the county jail Monday. His attorney, federal public defender Omar Greene of Little Rock, was not available for comment.

Investigators said they don't know whether anybody was working with Gordon or why he chose Little Rock. Nor do they know how many other mailings might have gone out, though another 1,000 were returned undeliverable.

just given to them," he said. "To use an old cliché, 'We help people help themselves.'"

This is the first significant undertaking in the campus chapter since it was first organized four years ago, and the effort has been matched with a lot of local interest and support for the cause, said Janine Roney, Habitat's fund-raising chairperson.

"We're hoping to raise about $2,000 through this first fund raiser, but we need about $30,000 to build a house, just to start out," she said. "All the bands are doing it for free. A lot of businesses have contributed, and a lot of the radio stations have helped us a lot."

The selection of recipients and the concentrated dedication of time by volunteer labor and various sub-contractors that donate their time is arduous in itself, but site selection is an equally complicated undertaking.

"Habitat tries to build entire neighborhoods, so we will build homes in clusters, and that has to be taken into account in site selection," Miller said. "We're thinking in terms of whole communities."

Karen Wheeler, recipient of a home from the Salina affiliate of Habitat for Humanity, has used the gift of a place to live as an opportunity to go back to school with one less thing to worry about.

Wheeler, the single mother of a 12-year-old and 5-year-old twins, is now pursuing a degree in early childhood education at Kansas State Wesleyan College.

"It's given me the incentive to really change things for the kids and to go through the transitions in deciding to go back to school," Wheeler said.

"We need a lot more support. Donations come in great, but we don't have enough volunteers," she said. "Hopefully, some of the college kids might help out. People don't understand. It's not just given to us."

library assistant, said.

The Human Resource Information System will automatically screen out employees who do not possess the skills required for each opening position, which will allow state employers to choose applicants from a much smaller list according to the skill level preferred by the employer, Bowker said.

With the current system, lists of applicants that passed minimum qualifications set by the state were sent to employers, and the old system sent too many names of applicants who were not necessarily qualified for the opening, Bowker said.

However, the only disadvantage to the new system is that the hiring process might take longer than the old one, Bowker said.

Employers with opening positions will be required to post the opening position for a minimum of five days, and if employers want to make the job available to people who are not connected with K-State, they will need to post the opening for a minimum of 10 working days.

"I think it's a good idea. I think it gives everyone more of a chance of transfer. You're not locked into a certain position," Ada Whitten, library assistant, said.

A promotion and transfer list will be posted around campus and on-line. She said state employers will also be able to advertise for the opening, Bowker said.

After the new system is in place, employees wanting to transfer and other people wanting a state job can call a job line and listen to each vacancy, Bowker said.

Registration forms for the new system will be available in the Human Resource Services employment office after Dec. 1, and meetings to inform employees and applicants how to fill out the forms will be scheduled after Dec. 1.

being a team effort between the three of us."

Fink signed a contract that goes through July 1996. The contract will be reinstated and end May 1997 if she receives a satisfactory evaluation.

Fink received her master's degree from the University of South Carolina in student personnel services in May 1992. Her undergraduate degree in human development and family studies is from Colorado State University.

"My graduate assistantship was with the department of residence life at South Carolina," Fink said.

She served as an adviser to South Carolina's residence hall association program, which is equivalent to Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.

Fink has been with Lafene's health education and promotions department since July 1992. Fink came to K-State with her husband, Andy, who is the director of Strong Complex.

"I'm really very excited about changing," Fink said.

She said she wanted to work in student services when she received her master's degree, but she had not had that opportunity until now.

"This gives me the opportunity to go back to my roots in what my degree is in," she said.

Fink said she planned to pursue higher education and this position will allow her to decide if she wants to work in health education or in student services.

"I'm looking forward to working with Kelley," John Potter, Student Senate chairman, said.

Potter said Fink would be working more closely with the judicial branch of student government during her 18-month contract.

"Kelley has a great deal of experience with student organizations," he said.

been able to find a job in the field you're in right now," Sorsha brutally replied. I swallowed hard. Even though I had not made any attempts to get a job yet, I was crossing my fingers that she wasn't making any accurate future predictions.

"I see you going into something clinical. I'm seeing opportunities in the area of marriage counseling," Sorsha said.

Sorry, that's not happening. I wanted to say. But before I could spit out a word, Sorsha informed me she sensed a health-related problem in my family. Or was it financial? She wasn't sure.

Were my parents or grandparents experiencing any poor health? she asked.

"No," I said. Gee, I thought these people were supposed to tell me about all of the happiness, fame and fortune that was going to come my way, not make these morbid suggestions.

To my great disappointment, Sorsha went on to tell me there would be no great wealth in my future, just a comfortable living. That was right before she told me that getting an internship at a mental institution was a way to pay off my debt.

Something strange started to happen about seven minutes into the conversation. Sorsha started making some startlingly accurate observations about my life. Yes, I just went through a breakup, and yes, I was knee-deep in debt.

"Sorsha, girl — you've got to be kidding me," I found myself saying. "Wow, this is way too true."

In a matter of minutes, I was transformed from a cool, collected, investigative journalist into a psychic hotline junkie, ready to hang on every word spewed out of Sorsha's all-knowing lips.

In those few fleeting moments I knew exactly why the hotlines were so popular. I was a victim of the psychic network.

Teen sweethearts committ suicide

Associated Press

MIAMI — Two eighth-grade sweethearts, forbidden by the girl's mother to see each other, apparently drowned themselves in a canal, leaving suicide notes that told of their undying love, their desperation and their hope of being together in another world.

The bodies of Maryling Flores, 13, and Christian Davila, 14, were found Tuesday in the murky, weed-choked waterway just a few blocks from the school they attended. Neither could swim. Maryling left more than six suicide notes, police said.

"You'll never be able to understand the love between me and Christian," she said in one addressed to her mother and father. "You don't let me see him in this world, so we're going to another place. Please don't cry for me, this is what I want. I want to feel happy, because I'm going to a place where I can be with Christian."

Maryling's mother had forbidden her Saturday to see Christian anymore, in part because they were so young, police said. Maryling had told friends she might be pregnant, and her mother feared the same thing, but an autopsy showed otherwise.

munity colleges and stay aimed at providing it for the larger universities," said Sue Peterson, assistant to the president for governmental relations.

But if the 10-percent cap is made law, K-State would not participate, Moeder said.

"Rather than lowering our loan volume, we would probably revert totally back to the Stafford Loan Program," Moeder said. "There is no reason to participate in a failing program that may not exist much longer."

Only freshmen and sophomores received loans with the direct-lending program this year at K-State.

"Our plan right now is to roll in another year of students, which would mean freshmen, sophomores and juniors would all get direct loans next year," Moeder said. "That's also assuming we're not one of the schools pulled out."

The education committee hopes to take its decision before Congress Friday. It will then be sent to President Clinton with the rest of the budget-reconciliation bill.

"It's all part of the budget-reconciliation bill. He could very well veto the bill for a number of other reasons, but I don't think he'd hinge his whole decision just on the direct lending," Peterson said.

POWELL

In the short term, Powell's decision was seen as a boon to Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, whose position as the GOP front-runner would have been imperiled by a Powell candidacy. The decision came amid some evidence that conservatives wary of Powell were rallying to Dole's side.

Hours before Powell's announcement, Dole was endorsed by New Hampshire Gov. Steve Merrill, adding strength to an already deep Dole campaign team in the first primary state. And a new Time-CNN poll of Republicans showed Dole's support had increased, and Powell's slipped a bit, over the last month as attention focused on Powell.

"I am pleased that General Powell has found a home in the Republican Party," Dole said.

"I will actively seek his advice and counsel as we work to bring our people together, broaden the appeal of our party and move our nation forward."

White House aides also breathed a sigh of relief: At this early date, polls showed Powell easily beating Clinton in a head-to-head match-up, something none of the GOP candidates could do.

Powell said he had no plans to endorse a presidential candidate or campaign for other Republicans next year. A multimillionaire from his wildly successful autobiography and $60,000 speaking fees, Powell said he would plunge into educational and charity work, entertain private-sector offers and search for a way to help build a more diverse Republican Party.

"I know that this is the right decision for me," he told a packed news conference at a suburban Washington hotel, with his wife, Alma, standing at his side. "It was not reached easily or without a great deal of personal anguish. For me and my family, saying no was even harder than saying yes."

Alma Powell confirmed she was adamantly opposed to a candidacy and worried about her husband's safety. Those fears were heightened by last week's assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, but, Powell said he was already leaning against running by then.

Powell said the concerns of his family had to be uppermost in his mind but that the overriding factor in his decision was that he did not burn with the desire to run for president.

He acknowledged he might be walking away from a chance to make history as the nation's first black president. Just the prospect, he said, was proof of America's progress in a time of considerable racial tensions.

Dole's declared rivals rushed to suggest they would benefit from his exit because Republicans dissatisfied with Dole would now have to look elsewhere for an alternative. Democrats saw gain for their side as well.

"We've dodged the big bullet," one Clinton aide said.

Some Democrats said the outspoken conservative criticism of Powell had exposed Republican intolerance. Sen. Christopher Dodd, the Democratic National Committee Chairman, said the message Powell received from Republicans was that moderates need not apply.

As word of Powell's decision spread across the country, it disappointed many Americans who saw Powell as the antidote to their political disenchantment and a bridge over America's racial divide.

"He would have pulled the country together," said Anthony Coleman, a black real estate broker in Littleton, Colo.

Union food service to be contracted out

Cristina Janney

city-government editor

Campus administrators have approved recommendations to contract out for traditional food service in the K-State Student Union as a part of its enhancement project.

Traditional food services include the Stateroom cafeteria, Bluemont Buffet, Union Station and catering.

The enhancement project was presented to students in spring 1994 for approval. The plan failed by less than 1 percent to get the 60-percent approval needed to go ahead with the project.

Despite the vote, Student Senate and the administration recommended the project to the Kansas Board of Regents, which approved it.

Students pay a $23 enhancement fee for the project. Changes to Union food services are only one part of the enhancement project, which will add 15,000 square feet to the Union.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, gave his approval Thursday to food services recommendations made by Union Director Bernard Pitts last week.

Bosco also approved Pitts' recommendation to bring three to four branded fast-food franchises and a convenience store into the Union as part of the enhancement project.

Mexican food, pizza and hamburger franchises will be considered for contracts.

The Union would also continue branding in the recreation area. The Union is in the first year of a three-year contract with Subway.

Exactly how much revenue would be generated through contracting and branding is unknown at this time, Bosco said.

The Union might receive a set fee or a percentage of sales from businesses operating in the Union.

The Union receives 10 percent of Subway's sales, and Bosco said the Union has been pleased with that agreement.

About 200 students and 27 full-time staff could lose their jobs when the food service changes are implemented.

Bosco said the Union would ask for provisions in the contracts with outside vendors, stipulating they use as many of the Union food service employees as possible.

Students from the College of Human Ecology who work for Union food services for academic credit will not be affected by the changes, Bosco said.

He said the Union would also consider pricing, selection and food quality in the selection of a contractor.

"At the other campuses we've visited, students have been very critical of selection and pricing," Bosco said. "Companies have to be competitive with their pricing and satisfy customers in order for them to keep their contracts."

The contractor would be required to provide some traditional Union food items, such as crown rolls, he said.

The Union will continue to sell beer, and Bosco said that could be attractive to prospective contractors.

Pitts said the Union would start the process of finding a contractor immediately.

He said he did not know when a contractor would take over food preparation in the Union.

Bosco said one of the challenges for food service during renovation

Students discuss library plan

■ Engineering Council to vote Nov. 20 on proposal

Kimberly Helfing

staff reporter

Student support for the College of Engineering's library to be built in the near future could mean a 3,000-square-foot difference.

"We're going to build this once. I want to build it with 20,000 square feet — not 17," Don Rathbone, dean of engineering, said.

Each year, engineering students pay an additional $200 in tuition used for equipment fees to the college.

Rathbone said he would like to see $100,000 of the $600,000 collected in equipment fees each year used for the next three years to help furnish the library with equipment and furniture.

About 50 engineering students and faculty members met Thursday night with Rathbone to discuss funding for the library.

Engineering Student Council will vote Nov. 20 whether to support the plan. If not, Rathbone said, it will be necessary to change the size of the addition in order to have a high-caliber library.

"I will not give on quality — that I will not do," Rathbone said. "We don't want a piece of junk. We want something we can be proud of."

The idea of building a new 20,000-square-foot library connected to Durland Hall became a reality Oct. 1 when Alice Fiedler donated $2 million to the college in the name of her husband, George Fiedler.

George Fiedler graduated from the college in 1926.

In addition, Alice Fiedler has committed to donating an additional $2 million to maintain the library and finish the basement of the library.

Although the library is still in the planning stages, it will probably contain a multimedia classroom, private group-study rooms with computer access, video-conferencing capabilities and 40 personal computers.

But some students at the forum voiced concerns about the way the equipment fee was being used.

Jon Hilton, senior in mechanical engineering, said that when the equipment fee was created five years ago, it was established to be used only for equipment.

"The fee has been abused," Hilton said.

But Rathbone said the changes that have taken place with the equipment fee have all been approved by Engineering Student Council.

"We've gone to Engineering Student Council every time," Rathbone said. "How can it be abused if you're going to the students?"

Some students at the forum said they were concerned that other computer labs would not be properly maintained if such a large portion of the equipment fee went to the library.

Rathbone said he did not believe students would see any large changes.

"You're making a trade-off," he said. "You're giving a little to get a lot."

Rathbone said he believed students, faculty and alumni would be able to take pride in the library and its capabilities.

"Our hope is that when it's finished, the engineering library will be the best in the country for its size," Rathbone said.

Rathbone will also be speaking at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday in Durland 173 about the equipment fee.

Engineering Student Council will vote about the issues at 6:30 p.m. Nov. 20 in Durland 152.

SHANE KEYSER

Jared Poole, sophomore in electrical engineering; Mark Williams, sophomore in mechanical engineering; and Garrett Truskett, junior in engineering, stand at attention serving as the color guards during the K-State Air Force ROTC Veterans Day memorial service Thursday afternoon at the Vietnam Memorial. Maj. Paul Vavra, commandant of cadets, gave a speech while a prisoner-of-war flag and an American flag hung at half-staff. A 21-gun salute was fired for those who died in service, and both flags were lowered and the American flag folded at the end of the ceremony.

Approved changes for Union

- Contract out for traditional food services, such as the Stateroom cafeteria, Bluemont Buffet, Union Station and catered functions.
- Bring three to five fast-food franchises into the proposed Union food court.
- Contract with a local vendor to provide a convenience store in the Union.
- A branded franchise would provide food service in the recreation area of the Union.
- Have vending services remain a Union in-house operation.

K-State football fans can cheer for the Wildcats while listening to the game on the Internet.

Terry Ratliff, assistant professor of library; Wayne Michaels, veterinary medicine multi-media specialist; and Tim McCune, junior in computer science, have recently added live play-by-play broadcast to their K-State homepage.

"It's just fun, and I'm a huge football fan," McCune said.

The K-State vs. University of Kansas game was the first to be broadcast on the Internet.

"Tim saw where Oklahoma was doing it and saw one of their pages," Ratliff said. "He got in touch with them, and that's how it came about."

McCune said Oklahoma University and Baylor University are the only other universities in the future Big 12 to broadcast its games on the Internet.

It took less than a week to add the radio coverage to the homepage.

"Monday night I was at home and saw the information. Tuesday, I shared it with the others.

Wednesday, we worked on getting permission from the athletic department and the network, and by Thursday and Friday we were setting up the audio," McCune said.

But a problem with the system during the Oklahoma game delayed audio until the fourth quarter.

McCune said more than 100 people logged on during that quarter and estimated the KU game drew about 400 people.

More than 10,000 people have logged onto the homepage since it started in mid-August. Almost 75 percent of the visitors to the homepage log in from K-State, but others have been from distant states such as New York, Florida and Arizona, he said.

"I've gotten e-mail from alumni all over the country," McCune said. "People who are just really happy we're doing something like this."

It gives K-State fans who can't get the game on any other media a chance to still cheer on the Cats, he said.

General-education plan approved

Lisa Elliott

staff writer

Student Senate voted its support for the general-education requirement Thursday night.

David Balk, chairman of the General Education Implementation Committee, spoke during Student Senate's first open period.

"We want you to broaden your education," he said. "General education is for people to take classes that give them breadth."

Balk said the plan would go into effect in fall 1997 if the implementation bill before Faculty Senate was passed. The timetable for implementation will be voted on by Faculty Senate Tuesday.

Troy Tuttle, senior in history education, spoke against the general-education proposal.

He passed out a list of questions about the proposal he thought Student Senate should answer before passing a resolution in support of the requirements.

"I think that before Student Senate can vote its support for this proposal, it should answer these questions," Tuttle said. "It won't add classes, but what you can take at this University will be limited."

Tuttle also said general education should focus on what is taught and not on how it is taught.

Balk said the general-education movement had been in the hands of the faculty since it started.

He said no one was telling teachers how to teach classes because they have the option to keep teaching courses in the same way or redesign the courses to fit general education.

Phil Anderson, faculty representative, said faculty were not told how to teach courses.

Ryan Kerschen, engineering senator, said he was opposed to the resolution because the plan told teachers how to teach their classes.

"Supporting general education is a good thing," Kerschen said, "but supporting this plan for implementing it is a bad thing."

Wendy Strevey, arts and sciences senator, said not

Black-and-white photos of 40-year-old performances line the wall of the Manhattan Civic Theatre gallery, relics of a time gone by.

Old programs are stapled all over the walls, and costumes hang from mannequin-like wicker forms.

Dwight Nesmith, a friendly-looking, white-haired man, walks around the gallery peering through his glasses at the old pictures.

He wheezes a laugh, stopping at two pictures. One of them is "Critic's Choice," in which he directed his son. The two labels had gotten switched.

"It's okay — they're just little, sticky labels," he said, placing the labels by the correct pictures.

Even after all the years of performances, he can name just about every one of the plays, most of which he has either acted in or directed.

The Manhattan Civic Theatre has been a part of the community for 40 years. Through good times and bad times, from the "dungeon" of City Hall to the new Manhattan Arts Center, Nesmith has been part of it all.

SUBCOMMITTEE RECOMMENDS LAFENE OFFICE VISITS REMAIN FREE

A Student Health Advisory Committee subcommittee is recommending office visits at Lafene Health Center continue to be free.

Lafene's fee is being reviewed by Student Senate this spring. As a part of that review process, Senate has requested organizations and services with fees being reviewed to submit reports to explain how user fees would affect student services.

The term "user fees" means only students who use services would have to pay for them.

With a user-fee system, students using Lafene might have to pay fees for office visits or more for other services.

The SHAC financial task force subcommittee has developed a draft of the report it will submit to Senate. The subcommittee submitted the report to SHAC Thursday.

"Our committee would like to see no physician-visit charge," Amy Martin, SHAC member, said.

When Lafene's fee was reviewed two years ago, Senate cut the fee by $10. This cut has created financial problems for Lafene.

The center has not been able to hire a doctor to replace one who retired earlier this year, resulting in students waiting for appointments when Lafene is busy.

Lafene is looking for ways to generate funds to make up for the decrease in fee revenue.

The draft report also proposes a hiring freeze, restructuring of departments, more use of student workers and development of a report on the specifics of what is being spent.

The report also recommended eliminating Lafene's weekend and evening hours.

Lafene is open from 8:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Saturday.

SHAC's finalized report to Senate is due in February.

"SHAC is working hard to find ways to generate revenue in order to not have office-visit charges," Ashley Weekly, SHAC member, said.

HEALTH PLAN COST $14 MILLION

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Clinton administration's ill-fated health-care reform plan cost nearly $14 million to draft, a sum that dwarfs the original White House price tag of less than $100,000, congressional auditors said Thursday.

Costs for the 12-member President's Task Force on Health Care Reform, which first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton oversaw, were spread across 10 agencies and totaled $13.8 million, according to a General Accounting Office report.

More than half that amount, $7.7 million, was spent between June and November 1993, when the White House was writing a 1,342-page bill to encompass the reforms it had settled on, according to the report by the investigative arm of Congress.

The Clinton bill was almost immediately discarded by Congress as various committees drafted their own plans and then feuded over which version should be voted on.

Congress abandoned the effort in late 1994 in an important blow to President Clinton's ambitious agenda.

Since then, the administration has been admonished that writing its own legislation was a costly infringement on a duty normally reserved for Congress.

ANIMAL SHELTER SHOOTS DOGS

SHEPHERDSVILLE, Ky. (AP) — It's a chore Bill "Hobert" Burkhead said he dreads: Nearly every day, he leads one dog after another to a secluded spot behind the Bullitt County Animal Shelter.

One by one, Burkhead places the barrel of his gun between their eyes and pulls the trigger. The carcasses of the unwanted, stray dogs soon pile up in a nearby pit for burial.

Burkhead, the county dog warden, and other officials said shooting dogs instead of other methods came down to money.

"You can get 50 dogs dispatched for a dollar," said Judge-Executive John Harper, head of county government.

The practice — which has gone on in Bullitt County for as long as anyone can remember — has drawn condemnation from animal-welfare groups across the country.

"A gunshot is something we consider to be inhumane," said Sally Fekety of the Humane Society of the United States. "Fundamentally, one of the most critical obligations is to prepare the most humane death possible for animals needing euthanasia. It's our duty."

Animal-welfare experts recommend an injection into the dog's leg of sodium pentobarbital, a barbiturate.

Faculty learns about technology

■ Workshop focuses on technology in the classroom

Gina Buster
staff reporter

The Teaching with Technology workshop was sponsored for faculty Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Student Union Big 8 Room.

The workshop was sponsored by the College of Agriculture and discussed how technology can enhance the teaching process and effectiveness.

"Part of the workshop series is for enhancing teaching effectiveness. Our goal is to motivate faculty to move in that direction," said John Havlin, professor of agronomy and Faculty Senate president.

William Graves, associate provost for information technology at the University of North Carolina, was the keynote speaker for the workshop.

"We want to focus on improving the environment for learning to enhance the student's learning experience," Graves said.

Graves said technology allowed much more teaching flexibility and faculty needed to have access to it. Technology must be well planned and budgeted by the University, he said.

Using technology in the classroom allows students to learn things in their own way, he said.

"From a student's point of view, over time technology will give you many more choices and allow you to customize the education you receive," Graves said.

During a demonstration period Wednesday afternoon, Medhat Morcos, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering, and Anil Pahwa, professor of electrical and computer engineering, displayed what they called distance teaching with blue paper and markers.

Morcos and Pahwa teach courses that are offered via live television to Kansas City and surrounding areas. They use an overhead camera mounted over a podium and place the lecture material on the podium. There are two televisions in the classrooms on which the students can see the material.

During the demonstration, they showed examples of good and bad slides used during actual classes.

"We want to share our experiences so people can get ideas of what works best," Pahwa said.

John Fritz, assistant professor of agronomy, attended the workshop and said he got several ideas from the workshop he wanted to incorporate into his classroom.

Fritz said he hoped to have e-mail and Internet access with his students, and he also said he wanted his students to have computer access to his notes.

"I want to cut down on the amount of lecture time," Fritz said.

"I want more time in the classroom for more important things like problem solving, discussions and using advanced learning skills."

CAMPUS

Leadership Week involves everyone

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

K-State students will be able to participate in a ski event, trust fall, mine field, rope bridge and listen to 15 speakers at the K-State Student Union next week.

Leadership Week, Monday through Friday, is sponsored by K-State Blue Key Senior Honorary to promote and celebrate leadership on campus and in the community.

"The most important thing about Leadership Week is to learn about leadership skills and developing those skills," Nonnie Shivers, senior in history and president of Blue Key, said. "The speakers will let people see how these skills transfer outside of K-State."

Shivers said most of the speakers are K-State alumni or faculty and will offer a variety of topics to the University.

"We tried to bring speakers in who will cater to different sides of campus and different people's interests to get as many people involved as possible," she said.

Nabeeha Kazi, senior in public relations and political science, said Blue Key has also organized leadership-building activities in addition to the speakers. Kazi is also a co-director of Leadership Week.

Mission Possible: The Leadership Challenge will be from noon to 1 p.m., Monday through Friday, in the K-State Student Union Courtyard, and will focus on communication, teamwork and risk taking.

Students will be able to participate in four activities in Mission Possible, Kazi said.

The rope bridge will force team members to develop a plan that will successfully pull them across the bridge, Kazi said.

There is also a mine field, where the team determines how to cross the field in the quickest and safest way possible, with limited resources, she said.

will be to maintain service during construction.

Some branding and contract services might be brought into the Union before the renovation is completed, he said.

He said he hoped the Union could have a contractor by July 1 so the company could work with architects in developing the enhancement plans.

"Our hope is that we will have a seamless transition from self-operation to a contract service,"

Pitts said.

University staff and architects are supposed to sit down for planning sessions for the project in early December.

Bosco said he would like to see traditional food service incorporated with branded foods in a proposed food court.

The Union is supposed to send out bids for construction in January 1997. Construction could take about a year.

"The nature of the project will be ongoing," Bosco said.

"We want to keep the building open during construction."

in our opinion

Student loan cap demands action from students

Students still have time to speak out against the proposal before it reaches a final decision.

The federal government is planning to put a 10-percent cap on the William D. Ford Federal Direct Lending Program.

That is a lousy idea.

The federal direct-loan program, a brainchild of President Clinton, was created to eliminate the long waiting periods students undergo before receiving their Stafford Loans.

Students with federal direct loans receive their loans directly from the government and bypass banks, guarantee agencies and other middlemen that make up the Stafford Loan Program.

The government actually created a program that would save students time, eliminate paperwork and be less confusing. And now it wants to cripple that program by capping it?

Almost 20 percent of the K-State loan volume and 40 percent of the national loan volume is through federal direct lending.

The education committee has agreed to cap direct lending, but the U.S. House and Senate must approve the decision before Clinton sees the proposal.

Students still have time to speak out against the proposal before it reaches a final decision.

This is our time to speak out.

Larry Moeder, director of financial aid, said he did not think K-State will be affected by the cap, but smaller schools and universities will be refused direct lending.

Only freshmen and sophomores received loans with the direct-lending program at K-State last year, and Moeder said he hoped next year's freshman would also have a chance to use the program.

But if the proposal passes, incoming freshmen at K-State still stand to lose out.

We urge you to call, write or e-mail our representatives before direct lending becomes capped indefinitely.

After all, how many of us enjoy waiting six months to get our financial aid?

The Collegian encourages you to contact your senator or representative on how you feel about direct lending for student loans.

CHRISTIAN EVOLUTIONIST

Editor,

In reply to Jeremy Stephens' column, "Evolutionists deny Jesus Christ":

In fact, it is possible to be a Christian and believe in evolution. This position is not unusual, rare or odd, and many of us take it. The issues involved are not simple and require much time and dedicated effort on the part of anyone interested in studying them.

I have compiled a list of books and articles that are helpful in this regard. I would be happy to mail or e-mail this list to anyone who may be interested. My e-mail address is cregeh@phy.ksu.ksu.edu.

EVOLUTION EVIDENCE

Editor,

After reading Jeremy Stephens' column concerning evolution, I felt a few comments needed to be made.

First, I would like to hear Stephens explain in detail what the theory of evolution is all about. It would be surprising to me if he had more than a vague, generalized knowledge of the subject.

Second, the reason there is no lengthy discussion of evolution vs. creation in the biology classes at K-State is not because of fear of the issue.

The real reason is evolution has become widely accepted in biology because of the large amount of evidence in support of evolution and the lack of evidence for a contrary theory.

In Stephens' whole column, he gave absolutely no evidence (other than his own beliefs) that evolution is not an acceptable theory.

Finally, a belief in evolution and a belief in God can be compatible. All it takes is an open mind and a good understanding of both subjects.

Before you write your next column, please take the time to actually learn something about your topic.

MOURNING FOR RABIN

Editor,

Like many people around the world, we are mourning the death of Yitzhak Rabin.

He was one of the greatest leaders of Israel and with any doubt, a major contributor to the peace process in the Middle East.

We do not advocate any form of violence at any time, nor do we feel it is a way to vocalize any sort of opinion.

We regret the monstrosity of this act, yet we feel it will not stunt the continuing growth of the peace process between Israel and the Arab countries.

A great leader has died. His hopes and ideas are still alive.

Hate mongers threaten hopes for

Peace

I saw a leaflet at the Collegian from the Heartland Revolutionary Guard on Tuesday and felt a disgust I hadn't felt since I read "Mein Kampf" by Adolf Hitler in junior high school.

For those of you who are unaware of it, the Heartland Revolutionary Guard seems to be an organization lingering around this campus or this town like a bad smell, leaving newsletters advocating the creation of a "Pure Nation, a Christian Republic uncontaminated by Jew Ingredients" and such other nonsensical crap.

This was the first time I had ever heard of this group, but according to the police, not the first time their stuff had been found.

I went on a bear hunt and found several other "manifestos" stuck together and stinking where they had been stuffed in the Collegian back files.

Had it been a week before the death of Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister of Israel, I would have been offended by what I'd read but probably would have shrugged my shoulders and ignored it.

But I was so sick of the hatred I see every day, everywhere. I got so tired of hearing about what might never happen in the Middle East or around the world now that Jews had begun to kill each other.

I couldn't take hearing peace in an independent Jewish state was an impossibility anymore.

I don't care if this is a real deal, thought up by some hate-mongering bunch of simpering gimps, who could double as extras for the next version of "Deliverance," intent on bringing back the "good old days" of stone-throwing and Jew-baiting, or if this is actually done as some sort of sick, stupid joke.

Personally, I don't care.

It pissed me off — royally.

After venting my spleen out on a select few, this whole Heartland Blah-Blah had another effect on me. A positive one as a matter of fact.

It brought home for me what was truly at stake in the Middle East.

If there can be peace in the Holy Land, there can be peace anywhere. Imagine that. If peace can be brought about in the Middle East, the world will have a model to apply to Ireland, Bosnia, Southeast Asia or Somalia. Any place where age-old hatred has consumed people almost beyond repair.

Maybe it can even be applied to the United States itself.

But we can't let the hatred eat us from the inside out. We can't allow the Heartland Revolutionary Guard to forget what we have been fighting for all these years — an end to all hatred, not just anti-semitism.

My father is a member of the Nation of Islam, and my mother was raised in Europe as a Jew.

For as long as I can remember, the idea of peace in the Middle East seemed as likely to occur as peace around the dinner table was whenever the topic of religion came up.

But whether the Holy Land was in the hands of my mother's people or my father's, or even those of my grandparents (one set of which is Protestant and the other Catholic), didn't ever matter to me as much as that land having peace.

I hope that just because one of the architects of that peace is gone does not mean that the bridge will not be built at all.

I also hope that, while brain-damaged individuals such as the Heartland Revolutionary Guard must exist to remind us why peace is precious, I hope their numbers remain small and their rantings always fall on deaf ears.

India possesses unknown qualities

To most people, the mention of India conjures up an image of an underdeveloped country with scenes of hungry people and dirty streets.

It is not just a land of the scantily clad sadhus with matted hair and flowing beards and roaming elephants.

There is more to India than these scenes of abject poverty, mantras and gurus. India is a land of enchanting beauty. It boasts of the magnificent Taj Mahal, the mighty Himalayas, and the sacred Ganges and is the home of the Mahatma.

It is also the cradle of a highly sophisticated and urbanized culture — The Indus Civilization — that thrived from about 2600 BC to 2000 BC. India is the land of two of the greatest epics of the world — Ramayana and Mahabharata. The Mahabharata is the longest epic in the world, almost 15 times as long as the Bible.

India is the seventh-largest country in the world and second-largest in Asia. It has a population of more than 913 million on a land area roughly a third of the U.S., making it the second-most populated country in the world. It is bordered by China, Nepal and Bhutan to the north, Pakistan to the northwest, and Sri Lanka to the south. India is also the largest peninsula surrounded by the Bay of Bengal to the east, the Arabian sea to the west and the Indian ocean to the south.

India was once the sparkling center of trade and knowledge in the world. People from all around the world came to India to partake in its wealth and gain from its knowledge.

Columbus had also set out to find a sea route to India. He landed in North America and mistook it for India. Therefore, the inhabitants were called Indians.

This is an explanation given why Native Americans are called Indians while people from India are also Indians.

India is the largest practicing democracy. It attained independence on Aug. 15, 1947, after 200 years of debilitating British rule.

A nation that was once amongst the richest and most prosperous was left fiscally crippled and physically devastated. India embraced democracy and set out with a mission of achieving social and economic prosperity.

Economically and socially, India has made great strides since independence. It has a well-developed infrastructure and a well-diversified industrial base.

Its pool of scientific and engineering personnel is reputedly the third-largest in the world, and its agricultural expansion has more than kept up with its population growth. India makes everything from light bulbs to communication satellites.

India is a land of fantastic diversity. It remains one of the most ethnically diverse countries. The peoples of India comprise widely varying mixtures of ethnic strains drawn from peoples settled in the subcontinent before the dawn of history and from its many invaders.

There are 24 languages spoken by a million or more people and numerous other languages and dialects. India has 25 states and seven union territories.

Visiting each state is like being in a new country. There is a complete change in food, language, clothing, crops and even physical characteristics of the people.

The beauty of India lies in its diversity. It is a nation where bullock carts coexist with satellite launch vehicles. India in one of the few countries in the world that exquisitely blends the diversity in cultures, people, languages and religion into a united nation.

India has recently shed its cloak of socialism and embarked on a bold plan to open its markets to the world and revitalize its economy.

Investment bankers and analysts rank India among the safest new places to invest in the world today.

India presents investors with a vast untapped market that has the world's largest and fastest growing middle class with tremendous buying power, a stable political environment committed to democratic ideals, a highly skilled labor force, essential infrastructure for trade and commerce like telecommunications, transportation networks and a well developed stock market.

An elaborate and established judicial system guarantees and protects the fundamental rights of all. A new, resurgent India is welcoming the world in all areas.

Whether you are looking for good investment opportunities, to climb the highest mountains, to conquer the mighty rivers, relaxing vacation escapes, spirituality, archeological expeditions or a journey back in time into a great historical past, you will find it in India.

The India Student Association at K-State will be hosting a fall festival Saturday at Manhattan Middle School to present a glimpse of the rich diversity of India to the people of Manhattan.

There will be food from various regions of India and a short cultural presentation drawn from its many songs and dances. This festival is a wonderful opportunity for the people of Manhattan to taste, see and hear India and to meet its people.

This festival is also a nostalgic experience to the more than 300 students from India at K-State. Hope to see you all there.

Operation Turkey will help the hungry

Collegian Staff

Some greek students will begin a food and fund-raising drive Monday to combat hunger in Riley County.

Operation Turkey will raise as much food as possible and donate the food to the Flint Hills Breadbasket for distribution to community.

The week-long event is sponsored by Order of Omega, a group of students who are in the top 1 percent of fraternities and sororities in scholarship, community, chapter and campus involvement.

"This is currently our biggest project to help the community," said Jeri Ann Blain, program coordinator for Order of Omega and senior in education. "We have been doing this for nine years now, and each year it grows."

Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said most people did not notice the need for emergency food assistance in the community.

"Hunger is one of those issues that people deal with every day. It's a daily issue for a lot of people," she said.

One in five people are living below the poverty level in Riley County, Bramhall said.

People tend to forget that people need food all the time and not just during Christmas and Thanksgiving.

JERI ANN BLAIN, PROGRAM COORDINATOR FOR ORDER OF OMEGA AND SENIOR IN EDUCATION

"In Riley county, 44 percent of people who have received emergency food assistance in the last 12 months are employed. These are actually the working poor," she said.

Activities begin Monday night with miss-a-meal night. The participating students will donate the money that would normally pay for a meal at a fraternity or sorority house to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

From 5 to 7 p.m., Tuesday and Thursday, the group members will collect canned goods door-to-door in the Manhattan community.

The group will be asking for non-perishable food items that can be put on the shelf and eaten anytime, Blain said.

■ Wednesday — When most fraternities and sororities have their group dinner, each person will be asked to donate a canned good to the cause.

■ Nov. 17 — The group will be able to measure its accomplishments when all of the participating chapters bring their collected canned goods to the Flint Hills Breadbasket to be weighed, Blain said. Local radio station KMKF-FM 101.5 will also do a live remote from the event.

"It's really a lot of fun. They stand out front and weigh in everyone's food," Bramhall said. "Every year, the numbers have grown. In the last two years, the numbers have almost doubled."

Some of the chapters involved will help the Flint Hills Breadbasket prepare the donated foods to be distributed, Blain said.

"It takes a lot of volunteers," Bramhall said. "Once the food comes in, it has to be sorted."

The food is separated and placed into a basket for people to pick up. Volunteers also deliver the baskets to the elderly and handicapped who cannot pick the food up, she said.

Operation Turkey is a wonderful opportunity for K-State's greek community to become involved in the community, said Megan Bolinder, publicity chairperson for Order of Omega and senior in English and secondary education.

"We all need to remember, especially after Homecoming Week, that we can give to the community just as much as we did for Homecoming," she said.

The holiday season is an important time of year to generate food for the community, said Shane Scott, president of Order of Omega and senior in marketing.

"At this time of year, more people are more apt to be generous and open their eyes," he said.

Blain said she hoped people would not forget it was important to donate for these types of causes all year.

"People tend to forget that people need food all the time and not just during Christmas and Thanksgiving," she said.

Last year, Operation Turkey collected more than 6,000 pounds of food for the Flint Hills Breadbasket, and the group plans to top that this year, Blain said.

'Calvin and Hobbes' creator calls it quits

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Calvin and Hobbes, the terrible tyke and his sidekick tiger, will be retired from the funny pages Dec. 31.

In a letter to newspaper editors Thursday, cartoonist Bill Watterson said the decision to end the strip was not a recent or easy decision.

"I believe I've done what I can do within the constraints of daily deadlines and small panels," Watterson, 38, said in the letter. "I am eager to work at a more thoughtful pace with fewer artistic compromises."

"Calvin and Hobbes" hit the comic pages in 1986 and entertained millions with the antics a 6-year-old boy with an overactive imagination and a not-so-stuffed tiger.

In the past nine years, the pair launched countless snowball ambushes, journeyed through space, tormented a babysitter and ran afoul of Calvin's patient parents.

"Calvin and Hobbes" is distributed internationally to nearly 2,400 newspapers. More than 23 million copies of books based on the cartoon are in print. All 13 collections were million-dollar sellers in their first year.

In his letter, Watterson said he had not decided what he would do next.

Lee Salem, editorial director at the Universal Press Syndicate in Kansas City, said after Dec. 31, the company will not provide reruns of the strip to newspapers the way it did when Watterson took a nine-month leave of absence in 1991 and again last year.

Salem said two "Calvin and Hobbes" book collections will be released next year. The books include comic strips that have already appeared in newspapers.

Beyond that, Salem said Universal Press does not know whether Watterson will produce new books or other materials.

"We hope he'll come up with something we can use in the market," Salem said, "but we don't know what the market will be."

The reclusive cartoonist has refused to be interviewed and will not reveal where he lives.

MEN'S EXHIBITION OPENER SATURDAY

K-State's men's basketball team will open the exhibition season at 7:05 p.m. Saturday against Autodoroshnik Russian Club.

Are you ready for basketball season? Will you need tortillas at games? Dan Lowerenz will tell you all you need to know about the Wildcats' men's and women's hoops.

Wildcat quarterback Matt Miller throws a pass against Oklahoma. Miller threw his 19th touchdown pass to break Chad May's K-State record for touchdown passes in a season. Saturday, he will attempt to break the Big 8 record of 20 touchdown passes in a season, set by Nebraska's Vince Ferragamo in 1976.

► FOOTBALL

Wildcat defense will be tested by nation's top rusher

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

Before this season, K-State probably looked at its schedule and thought its streak of facing great running backs was going to end after the Oklahoma game Nov. 4.

After all, no one thought before the season that Iowa State would have much of a running game with first-year coach Dan McCarney.

But that was 'BTD' — 'Before Troy Davis.' And in their 10th game of the season, the 8-1, No. 7 Wildcats face Davis, who has run for 1,647 yards this season.

"He's the total package. He can do it all," line-backer Percell Gaskins said.

"It's been awhile since I've seen a back like that," defensive end Nyle Wren said.

"They run him inside, outside and he starts inside and bounces outside," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "There isn't anything he can't do."

The game plan for the Cats this week is rather simple in discussion, but more difficult in action.

"Whatever defense we run, our focus is going to be on Troy Davis," Gaskins said.

Davis isn't a one-way runner. He can run right or left, inside or outside, get yards on the dive play or on a sweep. And at 5-feet 9-inches, the sophomore from Miami isn't an easy tackle.

"He has the low center of gravity, and he's really shifty and he's tough to tackle," Gaskins said.

This season, Davis has rushed for 302, 291, 203, 202, 166, 139, 121, 120 in eight games this season while falling just short of the 100-yard plateau against Oklahoma. He needs to average 177.5 yards in his last two games to become the fifth player in NCAA Division I history to rush for 2,000 yards, joining Marcus Allen, Barry Sanders, Rashaan Salaam and Mike Rozier.

"You'll find him everywhere quarterbacks probably will play. Bandhauer is more a pro-style quarterback, while Doxzon, who led the Cyclones to victory over K-State two years ago, is more of a runner.

"They really are two different types of quarterbacks," Snyder said. "Doxzon is a scrambler, option guy who scoots around pretty good."

Bandhauer is a poised true freshman. He's got good range, and at 6' 4", he can see out. He throws well and makes good decisions.

When throwing the ball, the Cyclones will look to Ed Williams and Mike Horacek. Williams, with 41 catches for 600 yards and five touchdowns, is third in the Big 8, averaging 68 yards a game while Horacek has caught 25 passes for 277 yards.

"They got some tall and strong receivers," said Canty, who leads the nation with six interceptions.

"Many people overlook them, but Ed Williams has caught more than 40 passes, and you've got to do something to catch 40 balls in a year. They've got a balanced attack. When they play-action, you have to honor the run and Troy Davis, and the play action will open things up for them."

For the nation's best defense, the game in Ames Saturday (1 p.m. kickoff) is a test, because it's given up 21, 17 and 49 points in its road games this season.

"We haven't really played great, great defense on the road yet," Gaskins said. "It's about time we prove to ourselves that we can play good on the road."

► CROSS COUNTRY

Women's, men's teams to run in NCAA District V

Top two teams, three individuals to go to nationals

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

Both K-State cross country teams face uphill tasks Saturday at the District V race in Stillwater, Okla.

The top two teams in each field advance to the NCAA Championships Nov. 20 in Ames, Iowa, and it will take great runs by both Wildcat squads in order to keep their season alive.

As has been the case all season, the women's side is more open than the men's race. Thanks to the absence of

No. 1 Colorado, who'll compete in another district, the only two ranked teams in the field are No. 19 Iowa State and No. 24 Missouri.

"The women's side is too close to call," Terry Drake, cross country coach said. "We were less than 20 points behind Iowa State at the Big 8 race, and I didn't think we ran that well."

The top teams after the Cyclones and Tigers are K-State, Nebraska and Drake University.

If Iowa State, Missouri and Nebraska finish 1-2-3 in the race, the Cats may have a better chance of getting more individuals into the NCAA race. The top three runners of non-advancing teams also move on to the NCAA Championships.

"I think if all of those make it, you can then pull all of those girls out, and we might get three girls in," Drake said.

Senior Irma Betancourt will lead the Cats.

"Irma's running well, and I think without the Colorado girls in there, she'll feel more confident," Drake said. "In her mind, I think she can beat the other girls and place really high."

In each of the past two races, the Cats have come closer to their competition. Missouri beat K-State by nearly 100 points at the NCAA Pre-Meet last month but only defeated the Cats by 10 points at the Big 8.

"We're getting closer and closer to everybody," Drake said. "I just hope this is the week."

"I have a pretty good feeling we'll do well. I've been pretty encouraged by our practices the last two weeks."

On the men's side, No. 2 Oklahoma State, a team Drake predicts will win the national championship, will be the favorite on its home course. But K-State will have to beat No. 7 Iowa State to advance as a team.

"I wish the men's side was as tight as the women's," Drake said. "But Oklahoma State and Iowa State are just so much better than everybody right now. We're picked fourth, but a solid third probably won't be good enough."

K-State will be banking on Oklahoma State and Iowa State taking their berth in the championships for granted.

"I think Oklahoma State and Iowa State think they have it wrapped up so they won't run their regular race," Drake said. "So if they do that, we have a chance."

Drake said if K-State's top three runners beat Iowa State's top three, they have a really good chance.

"Our fifth guy is right by their fifth guy and beat him at the Big 8, but their first three guys beat our first guy," Drake said. "Ryan (Clive-Smith) is getting better and if one of their first three guys has a bad race, then we got a chance to beat them, but we need some help."

Drake said Clive-Smith is almost assured of an at-large bid to the NCAA Championships with a good run tomorrow.

"I think it would be really hard to keep him out," Drake said. "This is his thing, and he loves this kind of competition. He was the second-best individual at the Big 8."

► VOLLEYBALL

Wildcats at Missouri in Big 8 contest

Shana Newell
staff writer

For the next couple weeks, focus will be the key for the K-State volleyball team.

Locked in a battle with Colorado for fourth-place in the Big 8 and the final spot in the Big 8 Tournament Nov. 24-25, the Wildcats must win their remaining matches.

The Cats will be taking the long drive east on I-70 to Columbia for a 1 p.m. match Sunday.

After dropping a match to Colorado Wednesday night, Missouri is 1-8 in the Big 8 and 6-22 overall. The Tigers have remained out of the basement of the conference only by staying a half game ahead of Kansas.

Coach Jim Moore said K-State has taken only one step toward reaching the tournament following Wednesday night's victory over Kansas. With only three more matches left in the regular season, Moore said the team is one quarter of the way to the tournament.

"We need to win all four matches," he said.

"Even though Oral Roberts has no bearing on the Big 8 outcome, they make a difference on who makes the NCAA tournament, especially after they beat Oklahoma last night."

To win those matches, Moore said the team has to be consistent.

Sophomore setter Devon Rynning said she agreed with Moore.

"We have to focus on things we need to do, and we have to keep our focus," she said.

The top four teams in the conference earn a spot at the Big 8 tournament in Omaha.

Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Iowa State have already clinched their berths, but Colorado and K-State are inching closer to a showdown in Boulder.

And qualifying for the Big 8 Tournament will go a long way toward earning an NCAA bid.

The Buffaloes are host to Iowa State Saturday night and travel to Oklahoma on Wednesday. They return home to host the Wildcats on Nov. 18.

K-State travels to Missouri, Oral Roberts University and Colorado to conclude its regular season. The Cats defeated the Tigers in Manhattan 3-0 last month.

Several Cats have been busy running down K-State records this season.

Junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk has 115 block assists for the year, the most ever at K-State in a single season.

Rynning has 1,178 set assists for the year, also the most ever for a K-State player in a single season.

Freshman middle blocker Val Wieck has 103 block assists for the season and only needs eight more to exceed Val Kastens' 1988 mark of 110. If Wieck achieves this, she will be in second place behind DeClerk.

► DOUBLES TEAM ALIVE AT ROLEX REGIONALS

The K-State women's tennis team continued play Wednesday at the Rolex Regional tournament on the campus of the University of Utah.

In main draw singles action, three of the five Wildcats in the first round advanced past their opening opponents.

Lena Pilipchak downed No. 14 seed Anne Covert of Oklahoma 6-0, 6-3; Yana Dorodnova defeated Iowa State's Erika Asmuss in a tough three-setter, 6-4, 5-7, 6-3 and Karen Nicholson defeated Sonal Patel of Colorado State, 6-2, 6-1.

Dinah Watson was defeated by Christy Sim of Kansas 6-4, 6-3, and Karina Kuregian fell to the No. 2 seed, Utah's Linda Engblom, 6-4, 1-6, 6-3. Both have been placed in the consolation draw.

All three K-Staters who advanced were defeated in the second round.

In doubles play, Kuregian and Pilipchak were ousted by a team from Brigham Young, while Dorodnova and Nicholson overcame another BYU team to advance to the second round.

Exhibition game played in Wildcat point guard's hometown

Dan Lewerenz
sports editor

In a world of big-time college athletics and national recruiting, students rarely get to play in front of a true home crowd.

Wednesday night, K-State sophomore point guard Amanda Chamberlain got a chance to do just that.

The Wildcats opened the exhibition season Wednesday in Holton High School's new gym with a 65-64 loss to Athletes in Action, a professional team composed of former college all-Americans.

Though the team would have liked to win, Coach Brian Agler said it was good to finally play against outside competition.

"I thought it was really good to play against somebody different and against some quality players," Agler said.

Because of this game, Agler said, the Cats will have improved by Friday, their next exhibition game.

The Cats opened slowly, hitting only seven of 33 shots (.212) in the first half.

Sophomore wing Brit Jacobson, who finished the game with 13 points after missing all seven of her shots in the first half, said the Cats might have been too excited to play well.

"I was nervous," Jacobson said. "And that's not an excuse. We came in ready to play — maybe a little over-ready."

But the Cats came back, cutting a 14-point early deficit to just four points at half.

"That first 10 minutes was an embarrassment," Agler said. "After we got that first 10 minutes on the court, we got our offense running, and our defense was better."

The Cats were able to take the lead early in the second half on a Jacobson layup.

"I screwed my head on," Jacobson said.

"I think that the team all screwed their heads on."

The score saw-sawed the rest of the game with Athletes in Action's Heidi Gillingham nailing a 15-footer to give Athletes in Action a one-point lead with just 0.8 seconds remaining.

The Cats were unable to score on the last play of the game.

Agler said playing on an unfamiliar court might have hindered the Cats down the stretch.

"I think if we were in Bramlage, the ladies would have been a little more comfortable at the end. And maybe we would have won the game."

But Agler and the players agreed it was exciting to play the game in Holton.

"We used to do this at UMKC, and it's always a lot of fun," Agler said.

Jacobson said the closeness of the crowd appealed to her.

"It was great fun," Jacobson said. "In Bramlage, the crowd is so much more out and up. Here, you're right into it."

Athletes in Action point guard Shelly Sheetz, who played against the Cats while at Colorado, said she enjoyed the atmosphere.

"I really love it," Sheetz said. "We played the U.S. National Team in a high-school gym, and it was really fun. It really brings back old memories."

"I wish I could have done this when I was in college."

The players were not the only people who enjoyed the experience. Several hundred Holton residents came out to see Chamberlain, who led the Holton Wildcats to their first 4A State Championship in 1994.

"Every little girl in Holton wants to be No. 22," Holton High Athletic Director Richard Bechard said, referring to Chamberlain's jersey number.

Betsy Schirmer, sophomore at Holton High, said she thought seeing teams like K-State play would help the high-school team develop.

"It helps us because we learn from what they can do," Schirmer said.

"Maybe then we can play like them." Schirmer's coach, Jon Holliday, said he agreed.

"I think they get to see the intensity and learn what it takes to go to the next level," Holliday said.

"They can see what it's like going from high school where it's fun to college where it's a job."

Even regular K-State women's basketball fans from Manhattan made the trip. Helen Sanford of Manhattan has been attending K-State women's basketball games since before the NCAA recognized the sport with an official championship.

"We really enjoyed it," Sanford said. "It was a beautiful ride out here, and I think this is just great."

Chamberlain also enjoyed the game. "It was great," Chamberlain said. "It was just so much fun seeing all the familiar faces in the crowd that I've been seeing for so long. I just loved it."

Chamberlain's parents, Jim and Kathy Chamberlain, agreed.

"It was a real thrill," Kathy Chamberlain said. "Amanda missed playing in this gym by a year. And she wanted it that way — she wanted to close out her senior year in the old gym."

"But it's nice to see her play here again."

Contest is a battle of wits

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

The first bowl game of the season will kick off at 9 a.m. Saturday in the Union Sunflower Room.

College Bowl '95 puts teams of students against each other in a contest of wits and knowledge.

"We've done a lot of publicity to show it's not just for really, really smart people," said Tim Henderson, program adviser for the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

Questions will be asked about history, literature, science, multiculturalism, religion, geography, current events, the arts, social sciences, sports and popular culture, Henderson said.

"People can come watch if they'd like," he said.

Seven teams are competing Saturday, and the entire event will be concluded in one day, he said.

It is a double-elimination tournament, with the top team advancing to the regional competition. Each game consists of two seven-minute rounds, Henderson said.

"We pay the registration for the winner at the regional tournament in February at K-State," Henderson said.

Ryan Norman, junior in pre-medicine and biology, competed in College Bowl two years ago and will be trying again Saturday.

"We do it more for fun than anything," he said. "We're just doing it to see how we compare."

Norman is on a team with some friends from the Smith Scholarship House and a woman from Smurthwaite House. Another team from Smith will be competing in College Bowl this weekend as well.

"Hopefully, we can meet up with them in the first or second round and see how we compare," Norman said.

To prepare for the event, he said members of the team have been watching "Jeopardy" on television.

"We just watch 'Jeopardy' every few days," Norman said. "Usually, somebody watches it every day."

Amanda Simpson, freshman in chemical engineering and math, agreed watching "Jeopardy" is a good way to prepare.

"I watch a lot of 'Jeopardy,'" she said. "It exposes you to knowledge you wouldn't really see in textbooks."

Unlike Norman, Simpson really does not know her teammates. She said she signed up individually and was paired up with them.

Simpson participated in something similar to College Bowl in high school, she said. Her high-school team took first, and Simpson would like to continue the winning streak in College Bowl.

"I intend to go all the way and try to win," she said.

Regardless of who wins, Henderson said the competition should be an enjoyable experience.

"It should be fun," he said. "It will be a good tournament."

DB92 celebrates 45th Birthday Blowout

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

November is a Birthday Blowout for K-State's student-operated radio station, KSDB-FM 91.9.

The celebration includes a trivia contest with giveaways every day through Wednesday, ending with an open house from noon to 3:00 p.m.

"We started the trivia contest on Oct. 16, and we've had a really great response," said Sarah Vogel, senior in mass communications and promotions director at DB92.

The trivia contest gives listeners a chance to learn a little about the station and win prizes at the same time, Vogel said.

"The contest is meant to educate the listeners about the history of the station," Vogel said. "We're giving away posters, CDs and T-shirts to the winners."

Wednesday, all trivia winners will have a chance to win the grand prize of 45 CDs and $45.

"All the names of the winners are thrown into the big bowl," Vogel said. "Then we'll pick one winner for the CDs and money."

DB92 originally started broadcasting in November 1950 inside Nichols gymnasium. A fire destroyed Nichols in 1968, leaving the station without a home for several years. DB92 received its current housing on the third floor of McCain Auditorium in 1975.

■ K-State team will put together program, booklet

K-State students might be educating the community about the history of Manhattan this summer.

Manhattan is one of seven communities being considered for the K-State Community Service Program by the program's faculty team members.

There are six community positions available, Carol Peak, director of the community service program, said.

Members of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board and members of the Manhattan Historic Districts Review Board met Wednesday night to discuss suggestions for the city's involvement in the program.

Junction City, Wyandotte County, Glasgow, Meade, Lincoln County and Elwood are also being considered.

At the meeting, it was decided the student team assigned to Manhattan would work on a community-education program and perhaps produce a booklet and video on historic homes in Manhattan.

Peak said different communities needed the students to work on different types of projects.

For example, Wyandotte County would like the program to focus on neighborhood organization in inner-city neighborhoods. Elwood would like the students to help organize a volunteer community newspaper.

A team led by David Wanberg, associate professor of landscape architecture, worked in Ness City last year. The team worked on a park-improvement plan.

The community-service program began in 1987. The program involves a group of students traveling to various communities and working on projects developed by an advisory board consisting of members of that community, Peak said.

The students live with families in the community so they can feel like part of the community, Peak said.

Teams from the program have worked in 58 communities of various sizes throughout the state, Peak said.

"We attempt to go to all areas of the state and have been very successful at that," she said.

Students from rural communities are often assigned to urban areas, and vice versa.

Manhattan has not participated in the program before.

one in the company's production of "Don't Drink the Water."

When he pulled the trigger, nothing happened. "I just kept pulling the trigger, click, click, click, bang," he said.

When he finally fired the gun and the guy fell over it looked so stupid, because in all that time he spent trying to fire the gun, the guy could have run away, Nesmith said.

"I had to go all the way around (the cylinder) before I finally shot the guy," Nesmith said.

If the light crew had gone to black, he could have just shot the guy in the dark, and nobody would have seen them standing there foolishly, he said.

"I was so ticked at the light crew. I spoke one short Anglo-Saxon word as I went off the stage."

Because only thin curtains separated the audience from backstage, Nesmith said he was pretty sure the whole audience heard it.

The theater had its grand opening in January 1955 with "Harvey," but it went defunct after some of the original founders, Jim and Dody Rosenberg, moved out of town.

Nesmith, a retired engineering professor, became involved with MCT after he appeared in "Mr. Roberts," a play sponsored by a group called the Toastmasters Club, formed so its members could better practice their speaking skills.

Many of the original members of MCT performed in "Mr. Roberts." After the performance, members of the cast got together to reincarnate the Manhattan Civic Theatre.

The group changed the spelling of the name from theater to theatre. With that, they started the new Manhattan Civic Theatre.

The Manhattan Civic Theatre opened its Spring 1965 season with "Blithe Spirit." Nesmith, the first MCT president, played the leading role of Charles.

The MCT's first home was in the Community Building, home of three shows in '65.

It wasn't exactly ideal.

"The entire lighting was six stovepipe spotlights," Nesmith said.

"The theatre had to share the building with sports teams, dog-training classes and even an aquarium show. They could only have the building for a week before the play, so they had to rehearse elsewhere," he said.

The seating was terrible. Curtains were hung from the ceiling. During the second season, the risers collapsed during one of the performances.

Indeed, some moments are funny only when flavored by the delectable spice of hindsight.

During the play "Sunshine Boys," for example, Nesmith's upper plate of teeth ejected into his hand. He just put them into his pocket and went on talking.

"I said 'cow,' and my upper front teeth came out in my hand right there in front of God and everybody," he said.

Although many things can go wrong in a performance, the actors just have to keep the play going.

"The theater is filled with things like this, which are hell when they are happening but very funny afterwards," Nesmith said.

Nesmith said the highlight of his career was giving his after-dinner speech at the 100th anniversary of the school of engineering at Notre Dame. Ann Landers and Buckminster Fuller were in the audience.

Although such experiences are notable, it is the times of joy and trial spent with Manhattan folks that have forged friendships of a lifetime.

"There is nothing quite like being in a theater group to make close friends," Nesmith said. "You get to depending on each other, and you get to loving each other."

Beauty and the Beholder: A contemporary analysis

Hello all,

I just wanted to apologize to everyone for my absence lately, especially to those who desperately needed their problems answered.

I know you all missed me. Even though many of you think I am all-knowing, I too have problems in my life that need addressing.

I needed to advise myself last week. Sorry for the inconvenience. Don't forget to send your letters in so that I can help you out.

Cassie

Dear Cassandra,

I am dating a girl whom I will call Sue. Sue is a great girl, but I don't feel sexually attracted to her. Now she is getting very serious, but I would like to play the field a little bit. My problem is that I want to be friends and still go out on dates, but last time I broke up with my girlfriend, things got ugly. I still care a lot for Sue, but she just doesn't have the kind of body I'm looking for. What should I do? Stick it out with Sue and have a good time for now, or let her go and find someone with a better body?

Signed,
Bluebirds

Dear Bluebirds,

You obviously are not happy in the relationship you are in. If you do stay in it, you are liable to become bitter about the entire situation, causing you to resent her even more.

In fact, little things she does might begin to get on your nerves simply because you would rather be with someone else. This would be even more damaging to your relationship than cutting it off. The best thing to do in this type of situation is to communicate. Try to be sensitive to her feelings, but don't lead her on if you don't want to see her anymore. And if you do want to remain friends with her, it is definitely important to act normal the next time you see her on campus or out in the 'Ville.

This might relieve the awkwardness of the situation, not to mention your reaction when you see her for the first time after you break up. This will show her you are truly serious about remaining friends. (Also, remember that friends do not lie to each other.)

But wait, Mr. Bluebird. I cannot let YOU off the hook so easily. I must also comment on the criteria you have established in judging who is worthy enough for you to date.

I believe you might be a little mixed up. Always remember, just because the package is decorated beautifully doesn't mean there are jewels inside; it could just be a lump of coal.

The station is used as a tool for K-State students who want to gain knowledge and practical experience in the broadcasting field.

"We're set up to serve an educational purpose," Joe Montgomery, station manager of DB92, said. "I think overall, we're doing a pretty good job."

The station is non-commercial so students are given the freedom to be experimental and unique, Vogel said. "The station benefits students because they get to learn how an actual radio station works," Vogel said. "We offer variety, and we have the freedom to try a little bit of everything."

Other than the station manager, the station is completely run by students.

"I serve a couple of functions similar to a commercial station," Montgomery said. "I keep the trade books, handle finances and make equipment purchase decisions."

Montgomery also helps hire disc jockeys, Vogel said.

Ultimately, DB92 seeks to achieve a balance of benefits to its audience and its participants, Montgomery said.

"We're always trying to balance the audience and the students," Montgomery said. "We try to serve an audience and provide an educational purpose at the same time."

The station is a combination of giving students hands-on experience and trying to build as much audience as possible, Vogel said.

in the program before.

"We have not had the Manhattan project before. We want students to have the view of Manhattan as their community," Peak said.

Peak said that ideally, students in the program will live with host parents not affiliated with the University so they will get to know the rest of the community better.

"There are two elements to the program," Peak said. "The first is to identify how the program will benefit the community. The other part, from the students point of view, is to have a citizenship experience."

Wanberg said the students benefited in a variety of ways.

"They get to participate in a service-oriented project," he said. "They also get to work as interdisciplinary teams with other people."

There are about four students and a faculty adviser assigned to each team. Both the student and faculty team members come from various fields, Peak said.

Wanberg has been a faculty adviser with the program for the past three years.

"I see my role as a mentor as being truly a mentor, not to be a boss, for example," Wanberg said.

Besides the faculty adviser, members of the community help the team.

"The program usually does a lot to bring different groups in the community together," Wanberg said.

The community benefits by both the product and the process, Wanberg said.

The students in the program are enrolled in a three-credit-hour planning class in the spring semester and then work in their designated community for eight weeks in summer.

Peak said for their work in the program, the students receive a $2,000 stipend and a $500 scholarship for the fall semester.

video clips from previous games.

"I'll usually add some play-by-play or music to make it a little more interesting," Michaels said.

"We've had clips ever since the Cincinnati game."

Ratliff also writes a post-game piece on each game and a forecast for the upcoming game.

The three said they have not seriously discussed expanding the homepage.

"There's a number of us that throw ideas around," Ratliff said.

Future possibilities include still pictures that change throughout the game, a scoreboard that changes the score as the game progresses or moving video along with the play-by-play.

In addition to their homepage, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics started one in September that includes all sports.

"Ours really promotes the program visually, where the athletic homepage is all print," Ratliff said.

"We're just big fans and not real big into statistics like the athletic department, so we complement each other well."

BLUE KEY

The land-ski event requires four team members moving from point A to point B on two skis with rope handles.

Finally, the trust fall puts the lives of the members in the hands of their teammates as they fall backwards off a platform into the arms of the team, Kazi said.

"It's a wonderful opportunity for students to interact with speakers and take part in leadership activities," Kazi said. "We want students to know that leadership comes in all styles, and there might be one right for them."

Blue Key has also organized "Choose Your Mission: Leadership Opportunities," where organizations from the community and K-State will come tell students how to get involved and use leadership skills to benefit them.

"Choose Your Mission" will be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Courtyard.

Kelly Fletcher, senior in biology and pre-physical therapy, said Leadership Week has been successful in the past, but this is the biggest year so far. Fletcher is also a co-director for the Leadership Week.

"We confirmed our speakers early this year, so we've had more time to promote it," she said. "It's never been this large, because last year only five speakers came, but hopefully having more speakers will give students more opportunities to attend."

Kazi said she wanted to encourage everyone to come.

"We want this year to be successful, and the only way to have this is to get as many people as possible to attend," she said.

SENATE

all the classes that would qualify for general education have been developed and approved.

Even if the proposal is implemented, there are still roughly two years to approve classes, she said.

Another concern raised was additional cost to students because of linear tuition.

Some courses that already exist will fill general-education requirements. General education will not increase the number of classes required for graduation.

Aubrey Abbott, Student Senate representative to Faculty Senate, said the general-education proposal was still being developed.

"I think a content-driven plan would be the ideal situation," Abbott said. "We tried that. We haven't been able to develop one."

Abbott said the plan would be reviewed annually under Faculty Senate's implementation plan.

Balk said there was some concern the Kansas Board of Regents would mandate a plan if the University could not come up with a general-education plan of its own.

Steve Weatherman, business senator, said his biggest concern was that the University would not be accredited in the next few years because the University cannot come up with a general-education plan.

Senate moved special orders for a resolution in support of the continued research and development of the general-education proposal. The resolution passed.

In other business, Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, resigned.

Henry said he resigned because he did not agree with Senate's direction. He said Senate spent too much time talking about allocations and not enough time helping students.

"This body is not about money. It is about students helping students," he said.

Before Henry announced his resignation, Senate Chair John Potter had an impeachment bill pending against Henry for excessive absences.

Henry said the impeachment bill made him evaluate his position as a senator but was not the reason for his resignation.

Henry was a member of the student body president's cabinet his freshman year, served as an intern and has been a senator for three years.

Brian Bowen, education senator, also resigned because he said he had other obligations.

In other business, six regular allocations were given second readings.

The Secret Masters of Fandom, Costa Rican Student Organization, Chinese Students and Scholars Association, Zairian Students of America, African American Student Union and the International Coordinating Council were allocated a total of $7,427.

In other business, six appointments were made.

Donna Holle was approved and sworn in as an education senator.

Five students were approved as members of judicial boards.

BUDGET

Stalemate won't stop vital jobs

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At the stroke of midnight tonight, the nation's government might lapse into a coma. Unless they're planning to visit a national park or apply for Social Security, most Americans won't notice.

That's because America's vital functions will continue even if a budget stalemate between Congress and the president brings about a federal shutdown Tuesday, sending 800,000 workers home and closing offices across the country.

About 1.2 million employees will stay on the job — printing money, chasing criminals, forecasting the weather, tracking the space shuttle if it's launched, feeding the animals at the National Zoo, guarding the Monets at the National Gallery of Art. And the nation's defenses will remain intact: The 1.5 million active-duty military personnel will stay at their posts. Mail will be delivered; Amtrak trains will run.

"Clearly, air traffic controllers have to stay on the job, or the planes won't fly," White House budget chief Alice Rivlin said in a recent interview. "Meat has to be inspected, or people won't buy it. Federal prison guards have to stay there, or otherwise, you would put prisoners in the street."

So all workers deemed essential to the nation will stay on the job, even though the government will have no authority to pay them. They will get back pay when the stalemate ends.

Usually that happens quickly. Only one of the four shutdowns since 1981 lasted more than one day, and because it was over a holiday weekend, few workers were affected. Several times, the threat of a shutdown has been averted with a last-minute compromise.

But this is a bitter standoff. Clinton has

UNION PROGRAM COUNCIL

Late entry wins College Bowl

Heather Stephany

staff reporter

After registering at the last possible moment the morning before, Team Four walked away from College Bowl '95 Saturday as champions.

The last-minute entry of Team Four bumped the total number of teams competing in the tournament to eight.

"We had made a decision we would accept teams until early Friday afternoon," said Tim Henderson, program adviser for the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

Captain of Team Four, Jason Ross, senior in computer engineering and math, said the team did not even exist until Thursday evening.

"We made a lot of really, really hurried phone calls in the zero hour," he said. "We didn't have official commitments from everyone until late Thursday."

With no preparation beforehand, Team Four defeated the all-freshmen team, Four Jerks and a Squirt, to win the competition.

For each game, there were two seven-minute rounds. Questions were asked about history, literature, science, multiculturalism, religion, geography, current events, the arts, social sciences, sports and popular culture.

Earlier in the morning, the two teams faced off with Four Jerks walking away with a narrow victory, 135-125. The teams met up again for the final game with Team Number Four beating Four Jerks, 205-70.

Four Jerks were undefeated going into the final game, while Team Four had a loss. When Four Jerks lost, another game was played between the two teams

Representatives predict tight budget

Brent Johnson

staff reporter

Two Manhattan representatives gave students a preview of the 1996 Kansas legislative session and what the 1997 budget might look like.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, and Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, attended the Student Senate Government Relations Committee meeting Sunday night.

Both representatives said they expected the state's budget to decrease.

"The budget will probably be the tightest it's ever been in my time with the state legislature," Hochhauser said.

Glasscock also said he predicted the upcoming budget to be smaller.

"My guess is that when the governor delivers the budget to the Legislature, it could be smaller than the fiscal year of '96," Glasscock said. "There could be a $40- to $70-million shortfall in the fiscal year of '97, depending on what Congress does with the budget."

The decrease in the state budget will probably mean an increase in tuition for students at Kansas Board of Regents universities.

No estimates are yet available as to how much tuition might increase because the budget for fiscal year 1997 has not yet been proposed.

"There's most likely going to be an upward pressure on tuition," Glasscock said.

Both representatives also spoke on gambling laws in Kansas and the possible change of speed limits on highways.

"It will be really interesting to see what happens with the speed-limit issue," Hochhauser said.

Glasscock said he thought there would be a longer debate on the speed limit than there would be on the budget.

Hochhauser said legislators would probably debate a number of gambling issues. The tracks aren't bringing in as much revenue as in recent years, and the idea of installing slot machines at the tracks is still an issue.

Casino gambling is also going to be discussed.

"The issue here is do you want casino-type gambling in Kansas," Hochhauser said.

Kansas dollars are being lost to Missouri because many Kansans go to Missouri for casino gambling, she said. Gambling revenues could help students in the long run if some of the money goes to the regents schools.

RESIDENCE HALLS

Halls unite for lock-in

Chad Moreland

staff reporter

Residence hall students had their own after-hours party Saturday night at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls sponsored a lock-in for students living in the residence halls from 11 p.m. Saturday to 3 a.m. Sunday.

"We usually have canoe races in the fall, but they were canceled, so the lock-in replaces them," said Rene Grant, graduate student in communication and regional planning and organizer of the event.

The lock-in gave the students a chance to interact with one another in a different environment, Grant said.

"It's really a good opportunity to get all the halls together for an event," Grant said.

Activities planned for the evening included a basketball tournament, volleyball, racquetball, table tennis and running on the track. There were also dancing, movies and refreshments for those who didn't want to play sports.

"I'm going to try to hit everything, especially basketball and volleyball," said Skip Pankewich, senior in mechanical engineering and resident of Goodnow Hall.

Other students came to the event for more specific reasons.

"I came mainly to practice volleyball," said Julie Crabtree, sophomore in biological chemistry and resident of Smurthwaite House.

Just having a good time was the main goal of many students at the lock-in.

"It's fun to hang out at the Rec,"

Trying for the elusive eight seconds

Becky Klenk

staff reporter

Sitting on a 2,800-pound bull for eight seconds looked easy to the crowd in Weber Arena for the first KSU Bull Mania sponsored by the Rodeo Club.

"I was really happy with the turnout, and we might try to do it again in the spring," said Jeff Gibson, senior in animal science and president of the Rodeo Club.

Raymond Wessel, the 1995 Pro-Rodeo Cowboy Association Circuit Champion of Cedar Point, won the finals round after receiving a 74 in the first round and an 86 in the finals.

Each cowboy and bull are judged by two judges. They each judge by the performance of the cowboy's ride and the performance of the bull for up to 25 points for each performance. Each judging can total up to 100 points.

The performance of the cowboys' ride is judged concerning how well they stay on the center of the bull, but they must keep one hand in the air at all times. If they use their spurs, they get extra points, but they are not required to use them.

Forty cowboys paid $100 to ride in the first-round events in the hope to be one of the Top 11, which qualified riders for the finals.

"I'd pay a $100 to win $5,000 any day," Scott McMahon of Goodwell, Okla., said.

McMahon competed in the event by riding Bean, but he received a no-score. In 1994, McMahon competed in the KSU Rodeo and was named the champion in the bull-riding event.

Monty Bennett, also from Goodwell, won the first round of events with the highest score of 92 after riding Flintstone.

"It felt like a childhood dream," Bennett said.

Bennett and McMahon were two of 40 cowboys who traveled to compete in the bull riding Saturday night.

Three cowboys from Dodge City Community College, who have rodeo scholarships, are from Hawaii. Of the three, Chris Sanderson made it to the finals with a score of 84.

Not only must competitors be talented to stay on the bull, they must also hope for an active bull.

The performance of the bull is marked by how well it spins, turns and bucks. Because this is 50 points of the cowboys' ride, it is their hope to get a good bucking bull, but it is all in the luck of the draw.

The cowboys are assigned bulls by a number pulled out of a hat. Many cowboys keep a "little black book" of bull's names and mark how they ride and which way they will turn when coming out of the shoot.

"I hope my bull bucks, and it's going to take a really good one to make it into the short round," Dave Samsel, participant from Manhattan, said.

"I'm a little frustrated at my ride tonight, but I'll do it again," said Kelly Griffin, past assistant rodeo coach for three years for the Rodeo Club and competitor after riding Terminator and receiving a no-score.

The bulls were supplied from five stock contractors in the prairie circuit. Some of the bulls were ridden in the National Finals Rodeo.

"The quality of the stock and the competition is just outrageous," Samsel said.

"We had a really good crowd, and they are what helps us get into it," said "Lightning" Larry Deges, rodeo clown and bull fighter from Pittsburg, Kan.

With 10 years of experience, these rodeo clowns put their life in front of the bulls to save the cowboys' life if needed.

"We had excellent bull riding tonight. It was real easy to get motivated," said Greg Herrell, rodeo clown and bull fighter from Hutchinson.

During the intermission before the finals round, local country radio personalities took their chance at bull riding.

"We're riding to defend the honor of B 104.7," said "Shotgun" Steve Kelly.

Shotgun rode Dead Air, an older-looking bull, and he managed to stay on for four seconds before falling off and running for the side.

Cowboy Brady Goodman rode Shark, an 100-pound bull calf. Goodman stayed on for two seconds before being ditched onto the ground.

Their rides were all in fun, and they seemed relieved after they were over.

"I'm just glad I survived," Shotgun said.

Many of the competitors were past rodeo champions, lifelong bull riders and Pro Rodeo Cowboy Association cowboys.

TYE DERRINGTON/Collegian

Steve From, Sutherland, Neb. resident, is bucked off and caught under Desert Storm at Weber Arena Saturday night at the first Bull Mania bull riding contest.

"Hope my bull bucks, and it's going to take a really good one to make it into the short round."

150-YEAR-OLD SKULL OF NATIVE AMERICAN FOUND BY KANSAS RIVER

MANHATTAN (AP) — Police first thought they could have a criminal investigation on their hands when a skull turned up on the banks of the Kansas River.

But when authorities agreed it was probably a case for archaeological investigators instead of criminal ones, the toothless remain was forwarded to the right people.

Jerry Ashberger, an amateur paleontologist, found the skull in July, southeast of Belvue. The Wabaunsee County sheriff's department took it first, and it eventually was sent to Michael Finnegan, a forensic anthropologist at K-State.

Finnegan, who was one of the experts who helped determine the remains taken from Jesse James' grave in Kearney, Mo.; removed a piece of the skull bone and radiated it with ultraviolet light.

When the light is handled properly, it reveals the amount of protein in the material. The greater the amount of protein, the younger the bone.

The skull had very little, and Finnegan attached an approximate age of at least 150 years to it.

Finnegan then examined the finer characteristics of the skull and determined it was that of an adult male with Native American ancestry. His work did not show how the man died.

He even tried to determine what tribe the man might have come from.

"We compare what we have found in the physical inspection to information on (ethnic) populations in the computer," he said. "But for something of this age, we probably won't have very much."

The skull was transferred to the state historical department, where it eventually will be placed before the Kansas Burial Sites Preservation Board.

If no area tribes want the skull for reburial, it likely will be placed in a state cemetery, Finnegan said.

TEENS HARASS FIREFIGHTERS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Firefighters said they would not respond to alarms at Southwest High School without a police escort after being harassed by students during their third trip to the school in one day.

Fire officials said that Thursday afternoon, a number of students sent a barrage of fireworks at Pumper 29 and that 15 to 20 students climbed aboard the fire truck. Pumper Capt. Tom Byrne said one student threw a punch at him inside the school.

"If they'd gone any farther, we would have considered ourselves under attack," Byrne said. "My driver felt threatened. I felt threatened."

No one was arrested.

Acting Superintendent Larry Ramsey asked school officials to try to identify the students involved.

The school district did not immediately return a telephone call Friday to comment on whether any students were being disciplined and what their punishment might be.

Ramsey also said that starting Friday, extra security would be in place.

The first alarm firefighters responded to at the school Thursday came at 8:48 a.m. The second was at 10:53 a.m., and the third was at 1:30 p.m.

"It appeared to me that the students were in control of the school, not the teachers or administrators," Battalion Chief John Tvedten said.

MANHATTAN MAN DIES IN FIRE

MANHATTAN (AP) — A house fire that killed a man might have been started by a faulty furnace, authorities said.

An autopsy was requested. The victim was identified as Harold Seymour, who lived alone in the house, rural fire chief Pat Collins said.

Seymour, 74, notified police at about 2 a.m. Saturday that his home was on fire.

The house was located 14 miles southeast of Manhattan.

Paul Meyer, fifth-year senior in architectural engineering, and Shawn Slyter, freshman in architectural engineering, help construct a house made of canned food that was donated to Cats for Cans Saturday afternoon. The house will be displayed at Manhattan Town Center, where donations can be dropped off until Friday.

Engineers build can castle

■ Organization collects food to benefit Breadbasket

Phil Roberts
staff reporter

With so many people getting excited for the upcoming holiday season, there are many people who don't have the opportunity to enjoy this festive season.

On Saturday, two groups teamed up to assist those in need. In association with the Flint Hills Breadbasket, Cats for Cans got together to build a house made out of canned food items.

The house is being constructed in the food court at Manhattan Town Center.

"We're basically a group of architectural engineers trying to raise awareness for Cats for Cans and the Flint Hills Breadbasket," Shawn Slyter, freshman in architectural engineering, said.

Each organization asks that individuals donate what they can.

The donations should be made in the form of cash or non-perishable food items.

After gathering a large portion of donated materials, members of both organizations started construction at 10 a.m. Saturday.

The construction continued until the house was complete.

The structure is complete with four walls, three doorways and three windows along with a roof structure.

Because there were numerous donations, there was no official count of how many cans there were.

"Next Friday, we're going to have a raffle," said Paul Meyer, fifth-year senior in architectural engineering.

"With the raffle, people will guess the number of cans. Right now, nobody's really counting," Meyer said.

A large portion of the house was constructed with donations from Hunt's and Quaker corporations. Large pallets of tomato paste and oatmeal were donated by the two corporations.

"I don't know what they're going to do with all that tomato paste when we get done," Slyter said.

After the construction and the raffle, all the donations that have been collected in the process will be taken back to the Breadbasket.

The Breadbasket will then distribute the items to those in need in Thanksgiving and Christmas baskets.

"Today, we've got about 15 people helping out," said Jason Kerns, fifth-year senior in architectural engineering.

"We've been doing this for years. It's kind of a competition between construction science students and architectural engineering students. It's for a great cause," Kerns said.

► LEADERSHIP WEEK

Student chose major to make difference

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

This is the first in a five-part series about students who have been selected as outstanding campus leaders by Blue Key National Honor Fraternity for Leadership Week '95.

For Tanisha Woodard, there are many late nights.

In order to balance her classes, her activities and her job, Woodard often finds herself staying up late to get everything finished.

"It's mostly my architecture classes that keep me so busy," Woodard, freshman in interior architecture, said. "I'm trying to balance everything because I want to get involved in more clubs."

Woodard

Woodard is already a member of the Black Student Union and the National Organization of Minority Architecture.

Because of all of her activities and the responsibilities they entail, Blue Key is recognizing Woodard as one of its five student leaders for Blue Key Leadership Week '95.

As the educational programs coordinator for BSU, Woodard arranges to bring in speakers and works to inform the group about issues that concern it.

mittee and the political issues committee," Woodard said.

She also organized the BSU Adopt-a-Student program, which introduces students to faculty mentors.

The program is not designed to give students a parent to keep them in line, but a friend to support them through their college years, Woodard said.

As a member of the National Organization of Minority Architecture Students, Woodard attends meetings and helps plan events.

The organization is designed to help minority architecture students get through their years here and help them with their classes, she said.

Woodard said she chose architecture because she wanted to make a lasting difference in the world.

"I've always liked to build things. I feel that buildings are everlasting, and I want to make an impact," she said.

This desire to make a difference is also the reason Woodard is so involved in the campus community.

"I've always wanted to have an impact on any part of society, and I've noticed that you have to be out in society to make an impact."

This sort of active involvement dates back to Woodard's involvement in student government in middle school and high school in Denver.

She was also a member of a number of high-school clubs and organizations, as well as a peer-counseling program.

"We were selected by certain counselors as having leadership qualities the (Black Student Union) inform students about issues like affirmative action or issues on campus, basically things that would affect our status here on campus.

TANISHA WOODARD
FRESHMAN IN INTERIOR ARCHITECTURE

"We inform students about issues like affirmative action or issues on campus, basically things that would affect our status here on campus," Woodard said.

She helped coordinate a campus observance of the Million Man March, including a candlelight vigil.

"Our committee helped facilitate the day. We watched the march on TV. It was cooperation between my com-because they felt that students weren't coming to the counselor with their problems, and maybe they would talk to the peer counselors, which actually they did and the program worked out pretty well," Woodard said.

She carried these leadership qualities to K-State, where she has taken advantage of the opportunities to get involved and become active in the community.

Partisan posturing prevents budget compromise

All three of you are jumping at the chance to point fingers at each other so you can say, "He caused the government to shut down."

President Clinton, Bob Dole and Newt Gingrich — shame on you. Shame on you for allowing your petty partisan bickering to get in the way of running the country. It seems that you all have forgotten what you were sent to Washington for in the first place. Because of your short-sighted presidential-election posturing, our government is probably going to shut down tonight at midnight.

Because of the three of you, and your bipartisan cronies in Congress, we're about to throw away millions of dollars — government shutdowns are expensive, you know — at a time when we need to be pinching our pennies.

How long are you going to allow it to go on? How much of our hard-earned tax dollars are you going to sacrifice on the altar of partisan politics? Have the three of you forgotten that politics is the art of compromise?

Don't think we don't see what's going on — this is presidential politics, plain and simple. It's no accident that three of the main players involved in this budget showdown are declared or undeclared candidates in the 1996 presidential elections.

We, the people, know that allowing the government to shut down is nothing more than presidential posturing — a feeble attempt to gain votes in the election next year. All three of you are jumping at the chance to point fingers at each other so you can say, "He caused the government to be shut down."

It's disgusting. And it may just backfire on you. You should remember the lesson of Maine a couple of years back. When Maine's government shut down over this kind of budget bickering, the voters of Maine had decided they had enough of both parties. Today, Maine's governor is an independent.

Something to keep in mind, considering the mood of the voters in this country.

Magic, ritual add color to neo-Pagan religions

Probably the strangest and most frightening aspects of neo-paganism to modern eyes are the practices of ritual and magic.

To Christian eyes, magic is seen as evil — the work of the devil, something to be abhorred and condemned, the parlance of those who are in league with Satan and seek to destroy Christianity.

To secular eyes, magic is treated as something to be scorned and ridiculed — superstition with no basis in scientific fact, the parlor illusions of charlatans and the absurd beliefs of flaky New Agers.

And I have to admit, in the course of my exploration of neo-paganism, this is probably the aspect that I am most uncomfortable with — the notion of casting spells and participating in rituals to channel and focus energy for the purpose of bringing about changes. I confess I have about as much trouble accepting this as I have of accepting the idea that the Earth is about 6,000 years old and was created in six days.

Neither seem to be supported by empirical data, and neither seems to me to be anything more than superstition. They just don't seem rational.

But then, neo-paganism isn't a strongly rational belief system. It is an intuitive one, where one experiences those things that cannot be defined by the logical, rational side of the brain. Neo-paganism is not exclusively a left-brained belief system, it is also (perhaps it is more so) a right-brained "feeling system" — a way of interacting with the universe that goes beyond rational thought.

There are aspects of our existence that can only be felt, not analyzed, and expressed only through metaphor, song, ritual, dance, art and sex.

This is the part of our existence that comes to us through our "collective unconscious," as Jung described it, a connection with the oldest parts of our brains. These parts of us existed long before our species developed higher rational thought, and we share this part of us with our animal siblings.

Scientists call the physical part of our brain, which we share with the rest of the vertebrates, the "R-Complex" (the 'R' stands for reptilian), and it is from this part of our brain that some of our most basic drives and emotions come from — anger, fear, lust, the drive to procreate, the urge to kill, hunt and survive. This part of us is not logical — it is animal.

And it is this part of us that neo-paganism addresses, through ritual, magic and nonlinear thought. This is how many (but not all) neo-pagans worship.

Magic, the art and craft of bringing about changes in the universe through ritual and energy focus, is a form of ritual that is especially common among the Wiccans — the modern day witches. Yes, they cast spells. Although I do not give much credence to the results they might or might not achieve, I am willing to respect their religious beliefs and practices.

Even if Wiccans were successfully able to cast magic spells, I would not fear them. This is because most Wiccans, I am told, adhere to what is called the "Witches Rede," which is basically a Wiccan version of the golden rule — "If it harms none, do what you will."

Also important in the Wiccan belief is the three-fold law (in some traditions, seven-fold), which states "all magic cast is returned to the caster three-fold." For this reason, magic cast must be only for good and protection, never for evil or selfish reasons.

I was privy to an interesting example of this type of magic ritual at K-State a couple of years ago, when Pat Robertson of the Christian Coalition came to give a Landon Lecture. A group of local Wiccans, believing Robertson is at heart evil and dangerous to the common good, opened a magic circle of protection around McCain Auditorium to "enclose the evil," as it were.

Whether anything objective actually happened as a result of the ritual, I found the event amusing and deliciously subversive.

But Wiccans are not the only breed of neo-pagans around. Other neo-pagan traditions focus less on the casting of magic spells, and more on the performing of ritual.

Ritual can involve anything from meditation to the use of symbolic ritual objects, chanting, burning incense and invoking the deities. It is apparently a basic human need to participate in rituals, and neo-paganism addresses this need.

For all of human existence, mystics and clerics and holy women have used ritual to alter their state of consciousness and change the way one interfaces and communicates with the universe.

It is for this reason that Christian prayer, like most forms of meditation, can be rightfully called a kind of prayer.

Many of the rituals pagans participate in honor the cycles of nature, mark the passing of time and seasons and revere the cyclical nature of existence.

Pagan ritual was once described to me as prayer, but with lots of Hollywood hoopla added. This seems to be an apt description, based on those rituals in which I have participated.

► RELIGION REBUTTAL

Editor,

I found Jeremy Stephens' column in Thursday's Collegian disappointing. I almost hoped for a moment it would not be the same old Creationist dogma — evolution is a religion, "evolutionists" react poorly when confronted, life has no meaning without JEE-ZUS.

According to my lovely wife's Webster's Desk Dictionary, religion is "1. A set of beliefs concerning the cause, nature and purpose of the universe, especially belief in God or gods. 2. An organized system of belief in and worship of God or gods. 3. Something one believes in or follows devoutly."

While No. 3 may seem to apply, it is beyond me what might constitute a "devout" evolutionist.

Also, the word "religion" connotes regular gatherings for worship. I, for one, have never seen or heard of the First Evolutionists Congregational Church, nor even the Church of Charles Darwin, Apostle.

As for point No. 2, evolutionists as a whole react less poorly when threatened, in my experience, than the average creationist.

I don't become defensive when someone attempts to criticize the Theory of Evolution, quite the contrary.

The poor bonehead just made my day. For people to criticize, they must have some knowledge of the subject — sad to say, most creationists do not.

As for JEE-ZUS, my life has plenty of meaning without him, thanks. You can tell him I said so. I haven't noticed him hanging around lately, or I'd tell him myself.

In conclusion, evolution is a scientific theory (some other theories of comparable importance are the Theory of Universal Gravitation, the Theory of Relativity and the Theory of Quantum Mechanics).

As such, it can be used to correlate observations and make valid predictions about the real world.

Creationism, on the other hand, is not scientific in that it cannot make any valid predictions about how the world is. Until you can offer valid criticism of evolution, keep your opinion to yourself. If not, you'd better have your facts straight.

Darren Guyton
Manhattan resident and
K-State alumnus

P.S. By the way, Jeremy, how do you deal with the fact that God lied to you? In your model, God put the fossil record and the light from distant stars in place — the only possible reason was to mislead us. How does that make you feel?

► COMPUTING PROBLEMS

Editor,

An article printed in the Nov. 8 issue of the Collegian reported about the concerns of Macintosh users that the new library online interface will not be fully Macintosh compatible for more than six months after the system will be operational for IBM PC users.

In the article, Computing and Network Services Director John Bucher was quoted as saying the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and the College of Education are the "only areas of the University that use Macintoshes as a main source of computers."

This understates the presence and importance of the Macintosh platform among students and faculty. The concentration of this operating system in certain departments and programs magnifies the potential harm caused by the delay in implementation of the Macintosh interface.

In addition, hundreds of students who rely on Macintoshes will suffer second-class citizenship until the interface is ready for them.

The software developers at Farrell Library have made a valiant and admirable effort to prepare the new system for implementation.

Library Dean Brice Hobrock has indicated he understands the concerns expressed by JMC in its request that the library delay some payment to the vendor, Endeavor Systems Inc. until the system is completely Macintosh-ready.

It is unfortunate that the library has selected a vendor who will not commit the resources necessary to have both versions ready at the same time.

So far, there has been no indication that the library has passed on to the vendor the concerns Macintosh users are raising, nor that the library even considered this problem when it first negotiated the contract. Now the library is forced to say it is helpless in the matter.

I hope this episode will be a cautionary tale for other University-wide computing systems planning efforts at K-State.

Dealing with roommate disputes

Now that half the semester is over and the weather has shown signs of winter, people seem to be wearing on each other's nerves.

Roommate disputes are one area of my job that I don't like to deal with because they are very personal and there are not clear solutions to the situation.

When an apartment or house is shared by two or more people, they take on certain legal responsibilities. If all the roommates are parties to the rental agreement with the landlord, they are usually obligated individually and as a group to fully perform under the terms of the lease agreement.

Thus, if a roommate leaves, the remaining roommates are still liable for the entire rent. It is possible and very much desirable to enter an agreement with the landlord whereby the landlord will not hold tenants jointly responsible. However, few landlords will do so.

Roommates also have legal responsibilities to each other. When renting an apartment, roommates usually agree to share the responsibilities to the landlord and also the rights to use the apartment.

Thus, a roommate who is left paying the entire rent has the right to sue the other roommates for reimbursement.

The sharing of other costs, such as utilities and phone bills, should be explicitly agreed upon.

The utility companies generally will permit only one person to be responsible, and the other roommates should be made liable to that person for their shares of the bills.

I recommend a written agreement be used so each party understands the responsibilities. A copy of a roommate agreement can be picked up at the Office of Consumer and Tenant Affairs in the K-State Student Union.

Each college household should have a copy of the Tenant's Handbook of Rights and Responsibilities, which can be purchased at the Union Copy Center. This handbook gives a clear understanding of various legal questions as they relate to off-campus living situations.

Problems between roommates arise because of differences and disagreements concerning personalities, habits and activities.

It is better to avoid such problems by using care in the selection of roommates. But, if the problem cannot be worked out, moving out might be the only choice.

If at all possible, each party should try to leave on good terms without any outstanding debts. When a roommate moves out, the roommate remaining is liable for the other share of the rent until a replacement is found.

The remaining roommates have a duty to try to find a replacement, but also have a reasonable amount of discretion in accepting the new roommate. Consumer Tenant Affairs offers a service for assisting students in finding a roommate.

A roommate selection sheet may be picked up at the Consumer Tenant Affairs office, in the Office of Student Activities and Services on the Ground Floor of the Union.

The selection sheet asks for biographical information and various likes and dislikes. Care should be taken in selecting a new roommate because of obvious reasons.

Once a roommate has decided to move out of the apartment, the landlord should be contacted. Written consent from the landlord is usually necessary before another person can move in.

It would be wise to include a provision in the original lease allowing substitution of roommates.

Most landlords are more willing to include such a provision than a general consent to sublease. The new roommate should sign the lease agreement.

Should you have any additional questions or problems concerning roommates, contact me at the Consumer Tenant Affairs office at 532-6541.

Blue Key promotes Leadership Week

Hello, and welcome to Leadership Week '95. Blue Key National Honor Fraternity has set aside this week to promote and celebrate leadership on campus, in the community and in the world we will soon be entering.

We've chosen the theme, "Ordinary People Doing Extraordinary Things," because we recognize the ability each of us have to take on leadership roles and the importances in doing so.

Leaders are not born. Some people may have qualities characteristic of great leaders, but great leaders have also learned some basic skills that have enabled them to accomplish extraordinary things.

These skills include communication, teamwork and decision-making, and they can be learned, or at least enhanced.

This week is the perfect occasion for everyone to begin this learning process.

Furthermore, the importance of accepting leadership roles in our society cannot be stressed enough. These roles can range from becoming a member of a local organization to serving as the CEO for an important corporation.

It doesn't matter. What does matter is that you take the initiative to do something.

Throughout the week, a total of 15 speakers from diverse disciplines, many of whom are K-State alumni, will share their leadership experiences with us.

We hope this large number of presenters will allow more students, faculty, staff and community members to become involved and join this celebration.

In addition, "Mission Possible: The Leadership Challenge Course" will allow student groups the opportunity to strengthen their team-building skills.

This will be done through a series of team initiatives, such as crossing a rope bridge and mine field, as well as completing trust falls from a platform and maneuvering land skis. These activities will be in the Union Courtyard everyday during the noon hour and should be great fun.

If this isn't enough for you, we will also be host to "Choose Your Mission: Leadership Opportunities" Wednesday in the Union from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.

A number of organizations in the Manhattan community and on campus that are looking for leaders will be available to provide information on how you can help out.

We invite you to become a part of the Leadership Week activities. We hope the week is successful, and it can be. The only tools needed are your enthusiasm and a small bit of your time.

Remember, the purpose of Leadership Week is to promote and celebrate leadership, but we shouldn't forget it is a great chance to have fun. We hope to meet you at the events this week — until then, peace, love and leadership.

► STEPSHOW THANKS

Editor,

The men of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Inc. would like to thank the K-State campus and Manhattan community for helping to make our "Neak Frasty '95" stepshow a success.

There were many people who doubted, administrators and students alike, that a student-run organization would be capable of pulling off such an event.

We proved that with the support of our fellow students we can accomplish anything that we set our minds to.

The success of our show should not be seen as a success for Alpha Phi Alpha only, but as a success for students in general.

We appreciate the patience of those in attendance when we encountered a technical problem. Your support will not be soon forgotten.

We would like to give the utmost thanks and gratitude to Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost of multicultural affairs, and the Union Program Council for their dedication to helping make the stepshow a success.

Your support will never be forgotten.

Finally, to those who went to great lengths to make our event a failure: your denial of support, discouraging words, backstabbing and utter hypocrisy only increased our zeal and determination to make "Neak Frasty '95" one of the best student/community events in K-State history.

Your actions did not go unnoticed and will not be forgotten.

COWBOYS CRUSHED BY 49ERS

IRVING, Texas (AP) — The defending Super Bowl champion San Francisco 49ers blitzed the Dallas Cowboys before the first quarter was over.

The 49ers, who were supposed to be on the downside because of injuries and free-agent losses, whipped the Cowboys 38-20 Sunday on their home field in a game reminiscent of the NFC championship meeting between the teams.

"This kind of game symbolizes the kind of team we are," linebacker Ken Norton said. "We're still the world champions. Dallas got caught up reading its press clippings and listening to the experts."

Hoops hints, stupid stuff and more Oklahoma mystique

It's hoops time.

The K-State men's and women's basketball teams have both played their exhibition openers, and their seasons start for real the Friday and Saturday after Thanksgiving.

Here's Dan's Handy Dandy Guide to K-State Basketball.

1. Leave the tortillas at home. They're a lot of fun at football games — and I'm sure it would be wild to see Powercat-spotted tortillas sailing from the top of the student section to President Jon Wefald's seat in Section 7. But I don't think it's quite as appropriate.

After all, the Wildcats aren't going to play basketball in the Fiesta Bowl. And throwing things on a basketball court is a bit more disruptive than throwing things on a football field.

But if I were to suggest an item to throw ...

The men's Final Four will be played at the Meadows in East Rutherford, N.J., so stolen car parts might be appropriate. Or maybe someone could throw Collegian columnist Scott Allen Miller on the court (I hear he has a wicked jump shot).

The women's Final Four will be played at the Charlotte Coliseum in Charlotte, N.C., so tobacco might be appropriate. That's better than what most people do with it anyway.

2. Think big. Those with an understanding of K-State basketball history won't recognize this year's men's team. At 6-feet, 9-inches and 240 pounds, center Johnnie Williams is a bruiser in the paint. And 6'11" center Gerald Eaker swatted a shot almost to half-court Saturday night against the Croatsians.

The Cats are still a year or two shy of seriously challenging for a Big 8 championship. But for once, we won't be the runts of the conference.

3. Think quick. K-State's women's basketball coach Brian Agler said at the beginning of the season this year's team is one of the quickest, most athletic he has ever coached. And Wednesday's exhibition game against Athletes in Action proved it.

The Cats were able to run often on AIA, and were generally successful in breaking the press. Though they were plagued by the typical early-season turnovers, that should work itself out by the time the season starts.

4. None of this does you any good if you're not at the games. Several season passes are still available for the men's games, and students are admitted free to women's games with a valid student ID.

After spending the last two weeks picking on Kansas fans, it seems only fair to run down the stupid things the Collegian sports staff have written this year.

Contributing writer Ryan O'Halloran picked Oklahoma State to upset the Cats in Stillwater, Okla. And O'Halloran's unprecedented 3-7 week picking college football games in the Oct. 20 issue might never be equaled.

Columnist Shane McCormick hasn't exactly done the best job of analyzing the NFL. He said the Kansas City Chiefs would finish no better than 8-8 in the Aug. 29 issue, and the Dallas Cowboys would rout the San Francisco 49ers. Good call, Shane.

Staff writer Shana Newell picked Kansas to finish the football season 3-8, 0-7 in the Big 8. They've done a little better than that.

Assistant sports editor Todd Stewart — after last week's column about his own retirement, what more needs to be said?

Even I, your illustrious sports editor, goofed when I wrote "The offense — particularly quarterback Matt Miller's passing attack — is questionable at best" in the Sept. 11 issue. Miller just broke the Big 8 record for passing touchdowns, and the Cats have topped 40 points in each of their last three games. Question answered, guys. Thanks ....

And an Oklahoma "mystique" update — the Sooners lost to Oklahoma State for the first time since 1976. Unless that "mystique" can beat Nebraska in Lincoln, OU won't go to a bowl game this year.

K-State routs Iowa State, 49-7

Shana Newell
staff writer

For the sixth time this season, K-State has blown out its opponent. The Wildcats trampled the Iowa State Cyclones 49-7 Saturday.

Quarterback Matt Miller, who completed 14 of 17 passes for 209 yards and three touchdowns, said the outing was a good offensive effort for the Cats.

"Our line was doing a good job. I was doing a good job throwing. Our receivers were doing a good job catching. Our backs were doing a good job running," he said. "Everything was clicking."

Even Coach Bill Snyder said he thought the team played well on both sides of the ball.

"We played well pretty much across the board," he said.

"Matt did a very good job. The key factor in the passing game was that Miller threw the ball well on third down."

Leading 28-7 at halftime, Snyder said the defense was playing cautiously during the first period, but, he said, that might have been his fault.

"We were playing tentatively," he said. "I take full responsibility for that because maybe I coached some caution into them."

The Cyclone defense was worn down by Miller's passing and running back Eric Hickson's rushing.

Hickson was the game's leading rusher with 144 yards until Snyder pulled him out in the fourth quarter. Iowa State coach Dan McCarney elected to keep running back Troy Davis, who had 133 yards, in the game so that Davis could chase his 2,000-yard career record. Davis ran for 50 more yards to finish with 183 yards for the game.

McCarney said K-State was a top 10 football team that dominated on the field and was well-coached.

"We tried to make things happen, but we couldn't stop them defensively," he said. "There was total domination by Kansas State. They did a super job stopping us on fourth down."

To start their domination, the Cats scored on seven of their first nine possessions. Four minutes into the game, Hickson ran around the left end for a gain of 46 yards as he was tackled at the Iowa State three-yard line. Two plays later, Miller rushed around the right end for a three-yard touchdown to take the lead 7-0.

On its next possession, K-State began the drive from its own 31-yard line. After a 48-yard completion from Miller to wide receiver Kevin Lockett and a couple of Hickson rushes, the Cats found themselves at the Iowa State 2-yard line. An offside penalty against the Cyclones moved the Cats to the 1-yard line, and Miller jumped over the pile for one of his two touchdown rushes. The Cats then had a 14-0 jumpstart on the Cyclones.

But Iowa State refused to lay down. In a 10-play drive, the Cyclones moved the ball 71 yards downfield to close the Wildcat gap to 14-7. Of those 10 plays, Davis rushed eight times for 49 yards.

Iowa State quarterback Todd Bandhauer tricked the K-State defense on the Wildcat 10-yard line as he threw for a completion to flanker Ed Williams. Snyder said the K-State defense concentrated on Davis, but not too much.

"We were extremely focused on Davis, and not overly," Snyder said. "They threw the ball a couple of times that really hurt us. But those were individual breakdowns, not scheming errors."

But K-State did not lose control of the game after the Cyclone's successful scoring drive. Miller and company reacted by moving the ball 67 yards in 10 plays to go ahead 21-7 on a 6-yard touchdown run by Hickson.

It was the K-State defense's turn to show why it is the No. 1 defense in the nation when the Cyclones failed to push Bandhauer through the line in a fourth-and-one situation at the Iowa State 32-yard line.

Five plays later, Miller connected with tight end Brian Lojka for a

Wildcats break several records

■ Miller, Running set records; Hickson records new personal best

Shana Newell
staff writer

Iowa State running back Troy Davis was not the only player chasing a record Saturday.

K-State had its own share of records broken this weekend.

Quarterback Matt Miller, wide receiver Mitch Running, running back Eric Hickson and the program itself achieved some impressive statistics in the 49-7 manhandling of the Cyclones.

Fans who said Miller would be unable to fill last year's quarterback Chad May's shoes could have eaten their words after Saturday's game.

Not only has Miller managed to slide into May's shoes quite nicely, he has slipped easily into those of former Nebraska quarterback Vince Ferragamo and former K-State quarterback Jason Smargiasso.

Having connected for three touchdown passes in the Iowa State game, Miller has thrown 22 for the season. That was enough to surpass the previous Big 8 single-season record, held for almost 20 years by Ferragamo. Ferragamo threw for 20 touchdowns in 1976 for the Cornhuskers.

After accounting for five touchdowns in both the Iowa State and Oklahoma blowouts, Miller has a total of 30 touchdowns for the season, passing for 22 and rushing for eight. That breaks May's 1993 season record of 23 touchdowns.

Miller's eight rushing touchdowns tie Smargiasso's single-season record set in 1992 for rushing touchdowns by a quarterback.

But Miller does not rush to put himself in the spotlight. Instead, he said he was content to just see the team do well.

"It doesn't mean diddly-squat — 9-

I means so much more to me than that record does," Miller said.

"Looking back when I'm older and I have my grandkid on my lap, it'll mean something, but right now, 9-1 means so much more."

And there were others in Saturday's star-studded cast who deserve recognition for their accomplishments.

Running did just what his name implies — he ran. With 370 yards on punt returns, Running shattered the K-State single-season record held by Andre Coleman. Coleman, now a San Diego Charger, returned punts for 362 yards in 1993.

And Running doesn't just return punts. Having caught at least one pass in 33 consecutive games, Running set a new K-State record and moved to third on the K-State career chart for pass receptions with 130, behind Michael Smith and Kevin Lockett.

Miller said that because of Lockett, Running sometimes gets overlooked, but that didn't mean he wasn't a great receiver.

"He can go up against any receiver in the nation," Miller said of Running. "He's just as good as anyone."

Lockett said that he and Running complemented each other on the field. "Mitch is a great receiver," Lockett said.

"Mitch and I complement each other real well. Sometimes Mitch has a great game, and sometimes I have a great game."

Hickson ran for a career-high 144 yards on 23 carries Saturday. In fact, before Coach Bill Snyder sat his No. 1 running back off the field in the fourth quarter, Hickson was the game's leading rusher.

Two fourth-quarter drives for the Cyclones allowed the nation's leading rusher, Troy Davis, to accumulate 183 yards.

K-State has scored more than 40 points in three straight contests during the same season for the first time since 1909.

three-yard touchdown.

The Cyclones threatened with three minutes remaining in the half. After driving 73 yards in 14 plays to the K-State 1-yard line, the Cyclones twice tried to shove fullback Rodney Guggenheim up the middle for the touchdown. Both times, the K-State defense came to the rescue to prevent Iowa State from finding the end zone.

The story was all but written as Miller connected with wide receivers Lockett and Mitch Running in the third quarter for touchdown passes of one and 31 yards respectively.

Backup quarterback Brian Kavanagh entered the game late in the third quarter. Connecting with wide receiver Tyson Schwiager early in the fourth period for a three-yard touchdown pass, Kavanagh upped the K-State score to 49-7.

"It was a fourth-down play, and I hadn't had a ball thrown in my direction. Coach wanted to give me the ball, so we ran a little play for me," Schwiager said. "There were thousands of people there, and I probably knew a lot of them. My family and friends were there. It meant a lot to come back home and play one last game here."

Schwiager credited the coaching staff for the Cat victories this season.

"It has to be our coaches and Coach Snyder," he said. "He pays so much attention to detail. Every week in practice, he prepares for the next team as though they're the best team we're going to play on our schedule."

The Cats now find themselves 9-1, 5-1 in the Big 8 and looking towards Colorado next weekend. But Lojka said the team was not talking about going bowling yet.

"It's been mentioned, but it hasn't been talked about once. And we're not going to start talking about it until after next week," Lojka said. "First thing we said when we got into the locker room today was 'Colorado, Colorado, Colorado.'"

Wildcats win exhibition opener over European team

■ K-State shoots well in 74-61 victory over Zagreb Basketball Club of Croatia

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury got what he wanted out of Saturday's exhibition opener at Bramlage Coliseum.

He got a good look at what his newcomers can do, and he saw how much the team had improved its shooting. But most importantly, he and his staff saw what they have to work on before their opener Nov. 25 against Bradley University.

The Wildcats opened the two-game exhibition schedule with a 74-61 win over Zagreb, Croatia, before 3,418 fans. K-State returns to action for a 8 p.m. tip-off Saturday against Pella Window.

"It was indicative of a game at this time of the year," Asbury said. "There was obviously some slippage from practice to game night, and you need a situation where you turn the lights on, put people in the seats and adjust to what's been happening in practice."

"But we needed to play against somebody else, and this wasn't a bad team."

In fact, the Cats led only 35-29 at the half, and Zagreb took the lead with 13 minutes left in the game.

K-State then went for a 10-0 run during a span of 3:09 to take a 58-52 lead on junior Gerald Eaker's basket inside.

Eaker was one of the many newcomers who showed the fans this wasn't the same centerless team of a year ago.

Junior Johnnie Williams was a people-mover inside, leading the Cats with "Our defense was horrible tonight," sophomore guard Mark Young said.

"It was communication. We didn't communicate very well."

Free-throw shooting and overall defense will be addressed by Asbury in practice today.

"We need to defend a little better, we need to rebound quite a bit better and we obviously need to concentrate on the free throws a little better. But I saw real positives," Asbury said.

Positives included K-State shooting 47.1 percent from the field, and the Cats stepped up on the defensive end when they had to.

"Defensively, we tightened up when we needed to tighten up," Asbury said.

"We started slipping screens and did a little bit better job."

"Offensively, I liked the way that we were unselfish and ran our offense. We tinkered with the offense a little bit and simplified it a little bit from a year ago."

All 14 players saw action, including freshman Shawn Rhodes, who will not be redshirted this season.

"I really needed to see the Manny Dies, the Shawn Rhodes, the Anton Huberts, the Gerald Eakers and the Johnnie Williams," Asbury said. "They all had their moments."

K-State has Friday's game to work out the kinks before the real season starts.

"Things are still rusty," Hatcher said.

"That's why we have these two exhibition games before the season starts."

12 points.

"Gerald and Johnnie did some things we haven't had happen in my time here — Gerald, defensively and a couple of things offensively, too," Asbury said. "And Johnnie defensively on the block — he's a load inside — and I was really pleased with them."

Asbury wasn't the only one impressed with the play of Williams.

"Johnnie did better than what I expected," said senior point guard Elliot Hatcher, the only other Cat in double figures with 11.

"He finished, and he's had a hard time of finishing in practice."

Williams tied the game at 45-45 with 13:11 left, and his two free throws gave K-State a 60-54 lead with 4:28 left in the game.

The junior struggled from the line, going 6-for-13, but he wasn't alone. K-State shot 22-for-41 from the stripe.

Defensively, the Cats allowed Zagreb to shoot 53 percent from three-point land.

"They shoot it well," Asbury said. "Shoot, if these guys don't shoot it well, they send them back to the war."

But it was the penetration that gave Zagreb open shots from the perimeter.

Cats keep Big 8 tourney hopes alive with win at Missouri

■ K-State earns season sweep of Tigers

Rich Peffley
staff reporter

The K-State volleyball team whipped the Missouri Tigers and earned its fifth Big 8 win Sunday afternoon in Columbia. The Wildcats dumped the Tigers in three straight games, winning 15-4, 15-7 and 15-9.

K-State overwhelmed Missouri, hitting .688 and winning the first game easily. The Cats recorded 12 kills and just one error in 16 total attacks to take the early match lead.

The Cats didn't let up in game two, hitting .393 with 12 kills and one error in 28 attacks.

Despite hitting just .167 in game three, the Cats still hit .350 for the match with 39 kills and 11 errors in 80 attempts in the decisive win.

"We played real well overall," K-State coach Jim Moore said. "We played very disciplined as a team. That is real important."

Missouri struggled throughout the match, hitting .000. The Tigers recorded 27 kills but also had 27 errors in 86 total attacks.

Freshman Kim Zschau led the Cats offensively with 11 kills in the match. Junior Kate DeClerk added 10.

Devon Rynning had 31 assists for the Cats, and DeClerk led the way defensively with nine digs and five block assists.

With the win, the Cats still have a shot at qualifying for the Big 8 Tournament. The Cats have just one Big 8 match left against the Colorado Buffaloes next Saturday. Colorado is now in fourth place in the conference. Only the top four teams in the conference are invited to the tournament.

"It's unfortunate that we have to scoreboard-watch," Moore said.

Colorado plays at second-place Oklahoma on Wednesday night. If the Buffs win, the Cats will be eliminated. However, if the Sooners win, then the winner of the K-State-Colorado match next weekend would determine the final entry in the tournament.

"I think it will be a very difficult match for Colorado," Moore said. "Oklahoma plays very well at home."

Even if the Cats are eliminated from the Big 8 Tournament, the team still has a good chance to make the NCAA Tournament.

"If we win both of our matches this week, it will be difficult to keep us out of the NCAA tournament," Moore said.

"There is a possibility that they would take five teams out of the Big 8."

The Cats now stand at 19-8 on the season and 5-6 in Big 8 play. With the loss, Missouri fell to 6-23 overall and 1-9 in league play.

"We played real well overall. We played very disciplined as a team. That's real important."

WIECK RECOVERING FROM APPENDECTOMY

K-State freshman middle blocker Val Wieck underwent a successful emergency appendectomy Thursday night.

"The surgery was a success, and she should recover quickly," K-State volleyball coach Jim Moore said.

Val Wieck

Wieck missed Sunday's match at Missouri, but she might be able to return in time for Wednesday's match at Oral Roberts University or the Wildcats' Nov. 18 match at Colorado.

Wieck leads K-State and is second in the Big 8 in hitting percentage at .368. She is also second in the squad and fourth in the conference in blocking, averaging 1.2 blocks per game.

BUDGET

promised to veto a bill needed to give most federal agencies the authority to keep spending money after the midnight deadline. He doesn't like other provisions the Republicans have attached to the bill. Both sides say they won't budge.

At a briefing at the White House, Rivlin said all federal workers have been told to report to work Tuesday, even those who will be furloughed, to make sure they have closed down their activities.

She said that because of the way the law was written, members of Congress, the president and political appointees who have been confirmed by the Senate would continue to be paid. She said she did not know whether they would be paid on time.

The effect will be obvious on the streets of the nation's capital, Rivlin said. Although schools will remain open and police and fire services will continue, trash collection will cease, she said.

"This dispute is different," said John Sturdivant, president of the American Federation of Government Employees. The workers who would be furloughed are planning for the worst.

Some might wonder, in these days of budget squeezing, why America needs non-essential employees. It's a broad category, covering about 40 percent of the non-uniformed work force.

"We reject that," Sturdivant said. "We think that all federal employees are essential."

In the case of a shutdown, who will miss these missing workers?

Tourists will. National monuments and parks will be closed, from Alcatraz Island to the Statue of Liberty. In Washington, the Smithsonian museums will be shut. So will the National Zoo. White House tours will be canceled.

Parks and battlefields too sprawling to be locked up, such as Yosemite and Yellowstone, will have only a skeleton crew on hand. That might be a plus for visitors who can breeze past entrance gates without paying fees and pitch camp for free.

People applying for government benefits or services will be out of luck. Workers won't be around to process claims for Social Security benefits or issue passports. Generally, people already eligible for retirement benefits, welfare checks or other government payments shouldn't be affected. Rivlin said Saturday that Medicare and Social Security checks would go out.

Economists and number-junkies will miss out. All of the Bureau of Labor Statistics' 1,500 employees are considered non-essential. The reams of statistics they normally churn out will be stopped.

Reporters will be in the dark. A government shutdown makes headlines, but it also makes news harder to cover. Some spokespersons will be laid off, including those who would normally give updates on the flight of Space Shuttle Atlantis, whose launch was planned for Sunday morning.

Of course, if a shutdown drags on for long, the number of people who notice it would steadily increase. That's what pressures politicians to compromise quickly.

Any length of shutdown has quiet costs that taxpayers will bear even if they don't know it. The General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress, estimated in 1991 that it would cost the government from $240 million to $600 million to close shop for three weekdays.

Past shutdowns didn't save money because the workers who stayed home were given back pay for the missed days. That's a decision Congress makes, and House and Senate leaders said Saturday that workers would get any wages lost during a shutdown.

Even if they do get paid, budget impasses are uncertain times for federal workers with mouths to feed and mortgages to meet. And they wreck events planned in advance, from training seminars to art exhibits.

At the Smithsonian's Arthur M. Sackler Gallery, workers spent the last four months painting scenery, adjusting the lighting and erecting a giant indoor tent for a display of ancient Chinese art.

Their deadline is Tuesday, the day planned for a VIP preview. But that's also the morning the government might shut down.

"It had to be Tuesday," spokeswoman Susan Bliss said. "What can we tell people?"

LOCK-IN

said Carmie Brown, sophomore in pre-dentistry and West Hall resident. "I don't get a chance to snoop around that much during the week."

One student thought the lock-in was a unique change from everyday life.

"It's something different, and it's the first time that I've done something like this in a long time," said Joy Hottovy, freshman in civil engineering and resident of Goodnow.

It cost the group $645 to rent the Rec Complex for the evening.

"Students who live in the residence halls pay for these activities with money from their housing and dining bill," Grant said.

"Guests of students paid a fee of $3 to participate in the event."

The $3 fee also allows these guests to participate in any other organized activities, Grant said.

The lock-in was the first time that the Rec Complex has ever been rented out.

"This is our first time renting," Derek Walters, facility manager at the Rec Complex, said. "We're limiting it to down times and mainly the summer and holidays."

Although staff members from the Rec Complex had to put in some late hours, they felt that it was still worth their time.

"We get paid overtime, so it's not too bad," said Susan Sokol, junior in nutrition and exercise science.

because both of them each had one loss then.

"It was kind of like a tie breaker," Henderson said.

Because Team Four came out on top, it will now advance to the regional competition, which will be in February at K-State. Henderson said UPC will pay the registration for Team Four to participate in the event.

Although they lost, the members of Four Jerks said they enjoyed the event and were satisfied with their performance.

"Initially, we did better than we thought we would since we didn't practice as a team," said Marshall Moluf, freshman in computer engineering. "We did better and better as the day went on until the finals when we got stomped."

Team captain of Four Jerks, Alex Stucky, freshman in nuclear engineering, said he thought the group exceeded its own expectations and enjoyed the competition.

"We'll definitely be back," he said.

Many of the competitors said participating in the event was an enjoyable experience.

"I think it's a lot of fun, and I wish I could do it more often," Cory Teubner, sophomore in history, said. "I'll have to buy Trivial Pursuit for my quick fix."

Henderson said College Bowl '95 went well overall.

"The first couple games were a little bumpy, but that is to be expected," he said.

Henderson attributed a large amount of the success to the volunteers helping with the event.

"We had excellent volunteers from various UPC committees," he said. "Overall, I think it went well."

Party founder to visit KSU

Black Panther leader will speak Wednesday

Nikola Zytow
staff reporter

Bobby Seale, co-founder of the Black Panther Party, will speak for Blue Key Leadership Week 7 p.m. Wednesday in Union Forum Hall.

"He'll probably talk most about his experiences in the '60s," said Matt Jones, chairman of Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

Along with Huey Newton, co-founder of the Black Panther Party, Seale organized one of the first Black Student Unions in the United States in 1965.

Within a year, the two men formed the Black Panther Party.

The party, which began with only 400 members, soon grew to about 5,000 members nationwide.

A lot of people associate Seale and the Black Panther Party with militancy, Jones said.

"But Seale believed that it was more important to build up black communities than demand rights by force," Jones said.

He worked to establish programs like breakfasts for school children, cooperative housing and mass voter-registration drives.

Seale was a member of the Chicago Eight, a group of men who were tried and acquitted for inciting riots at the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago. During the same trial, he was convicted of 16

Roberts decides against running for U.S. Senate

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Rep. Pat Roberts said Monday his decision not to mount a 1996 Senate campaign centered on the importance to Kansas of his position as chairman of the House Agriculture Committee as Congress grapples with the farm bill.

"I don't think you can be a part-time chairman and a full-time Senate candidate," Roberts said at a news conference. "I can't do that. It's not right. These issues are going to affect the daily lives and pocketbooks of Kansans."

Roberts, who said he will seek a ninth House term from Kansas' 1st District, insisted his decision should not be read as an indicator of whether Sen. Nancy Kassebaum plans to seek a fourth term. Her announcement is expected next week.

Roberts said he talked with Kassebaum, R-Kan., before making his decision but said he did not know for certain whether she will retire or run. But he made reference to several reports that she might not seek reelection.

Native crops feed the world

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

The effect of Native American crops and commodities have changed the world, a lecturer for the Lou Douglas Lecture Series said Monday night.

Jack Weatherford, a writer and professor of anthropology at Macalester College, gave his speech, "Indian givers: The Native Roots of American Culture," during the fourth Lou Douglas Lecture this year.

Weatherford said he became interested in how Native Americans sculpted the world when he was living and studying in a German village.

"I saw the impact of Native American crops and commodities on this village, and I backed into this area," he said. "This subject just slowly took me over — soon it became an obsession."

Weatherford said he was not trained as a Native American expert, but has traveled to every continent and observed how different cultures have been affected by Native American contributions.

If you had to narrow the most significant contributions down to one thing, food would be the most important, Weatherford said.

Bills vetoed; standoff begins

WASHINGTON (AP) — The White House meeting came after Clinton vetoed twin spending and borrowing bills, insisting Republicans drop provisions that would raise Medicare premiums and cut education and environmental spending. Republicans urgently requested to see Clinton and went to the White House at 10 p.m.

"I think we've got some tough problems to solve," House Democratic Leader Dick Gephardt said after the White House meeting.

"This could last for a while," Gephardt said, adding Republicans had rejected the idea of extending for 48 hours the spending authority that expired at midnight.

"A lot of innocent people will be hurt," he said. "We should not be facing this kind of blackmail."

The key stumbling remained GOP insistence on Medicare premium increase.

"This cannot be resolved as long as Medicare is on the table," Gephardt said.

Clinton said Medicare increases were not necessary to meet Republican demands for a balanced budget.

"If America must close down access to quality education, a clean environment and affordable health care for our seniors in order to keep the government open, then that price is too high," he said in vetoing a temporary spending bill.

Workers feel shutdown

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Eight hundred thousand federal government workers were sent home today when the federal government shut down.

After a weekend stalemate, Congressional leaders and President Clinton failed to work out an agreement to keep the federal government operating past the Nov. 14 midnight deadline.

Workers reported to work this morning to make sure activities had been suspended, and then 800,000 workers were sent home.

The government is continuing to operate health services, border patrol, air traffic control, meat inspection and the military. Social Security, welfare, food stamps and most veterans' benefits are also exempted.

"We probably won't do anything different," Marvin Roth, Manhattan postmaster, said. "We're an independent agency. We'll still be operating business as usual."

However, few passports will be issued, national parks from Alcatraz Island to the Statue of Liberty and the Smithsonian Institute museums have been closed.

"We'll continue to take applications for passports and process them," Roth said.

Although the Manhattan Post Office will still be processing the passport applications and sending them on, they might get held up farther down the line.

One area that will affect many programs administered by Kansas is the stopping of federal grants. Social and Rehabilitation Services is administered by the state, but many of its programs are at least partially funded by federal grant money.

Manhattan Area Social and Rehabilitation Services could be put on furlough by the state if the federal government is shut down for long.

"We really have a furlough plan with the state that will go into effect sometime," said Kip Lee, Manhattan area SRS income maintenance chief.

Because the state is running low on funds, the furlough plan will allow the state to keep SRS open and support the programs longer.

The Manhattan Area office serves Riley and seven other counties. If SRS is put on furlough, employees will work only part-time, administering programs and process-

MUSIC

Lifelong jazz musician returns to Kansas to play the blues

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Missouri is known as a melting pot of talented blues and jazz artists, but Ogden is the hot spot for one local artist.

Lifetime-musician Shu-Bee Villery has toured year round throughout the United States and Europe to blow his brass-reeds harp, play the jazz organ and accordian at clubs, events and jazz festivals.

"We have three shows in one — jazz, blues and R&B," Villery said. "And I do the cajun and everything blues, too."

Villery has recently returned from a week-long tour, hitting venues in Kansas, Missouri and Texas.

He plays the kind of irresistible, get-up-and-go music that gets the audience swaying, snapping and shaking. Villery's stainless-steel harmonica resounds as strongly as the drum, carrying tempo as sharp as the tunes belted from Hurricane Mary, producing a sound that is part skill and part magic.

This 6-foot-2 Creole man of

Villery

Choctaw and French descent grew up in Priean Lake, La., where he began playing music at six years old.

"My folks are all musically inclined," Villery said. "We've all done something."

He played his first gig in Louisiana at the age of nine. Later, he moved to Texas. He said this was an ideal place to meet a girl, compared with his small hometown.

"I couldn't even go back home and find a girlfriend because they're all my kin," he said laughing. "But, I don't really want to be bothered."

Villery said life as a musician is hard on relationships because of the traveling lifestyle. Touring has taken him to London, Spain, Australia and Canada, to name a few.

But all the motion aside, it doesn't seem to matter to Villery, who found a home in Ogden and a family in his friends when he moved to the area nearly 12 years ago.

"I came here when I was happily married, then everything went to pieces," Villery said. "But only the strong survive. I had to start off brand new as an old man."

But Villery decided to stay in Kansas and start from scratch. He said he fell in love with the people, the area and the quiet life.

STUDENTS TO REMEMBER, PAY TRIBUTE TO SLAIN ISRAELI LEADER

Students will gather at noon today on the main floor of the K-State Student Union for a short ceremony in memory of Yitzhak Rabin, former prime minister of Israel.

The event, sponsored by the B'nai B'rith Hillel Jewish Student Organization and the KSU Committee on Religion and Campus Ministry, will include an invocation, scripture reading and prayers from campus ministers. In addition, a select number of students will give reflections on Rabin's death.

There are several reasons for the memorial, said Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities with the Dean of Student Life Office.

"The purpose of this event is to remember the loss of Prime Minister Rabin and the hurt to the nation of Israel," Fallon said. "It is to allow us in our community, to mourn and share our feelings and grief."

Fallon said people from all faiths are invited to participate in the service.

"It will help us commit ourselves to deeper acceptance and awareness of persons of different religious background and diversities and to commit ourselves to peace and nonviolence," Fallon said.

Fallon said he expected the ceremony to last 20-30 minutes.

"We want people from all faiths to meet each other and share their feelings," he said.

Rabin was shot and killed Nov. 4, following his speech at a peace rally in Tel Aviv, Israel.

K-STATE SOIL JUDGING TEAM PLACES 2ND AT REGIONAL COMPETITION

The K-State soil judging team placed second at the Region Five Collegiate Soil Judging Contest.

The contest, at Iowa State University, advanced the team to the national contest at Oklahoma State University in April.

"It's a great feeling for me, getting to go to nationals a second time," John Zwonitzer, senior in agronomy, said.

Three K-State students placed in the individual bracket. Laura Fortner, junior in agronomy, placed third; Rita Schartz, junior in agronomy, placed fifth and Zwonitzer placed sixth.

The contest includes extracting soil samples from a pit that is about 8 feet by 10 feet wide and 6 feet deep. From the samples, participants examine many different properties of the soil to determine exactly what type of soil it is, Michel Ransom, professor of agronomy, said.

Some of the different characteristics used to determine the classification are texture, color, soil hydrology, land form, parent material and slope.

"Getting the texture and color is critical to getting the classification right," Ransom said.

Fortner said because almost all soil is different, the best way to prepare for competition is to go to the site and judge the soil.

"I like to see the different soils.

It's very exciting, and it's amazing how different the soils are," she said.

The team usually leaves for the competition site on a Monday if competition begins Thursday or Friday, and it practices judging the soil on nine or 10 pits throughout the week.

Zwonitzer said there are many different things about soil judging that he likes, especially competition.

"I enjoy competition, and I like that competitive edge. You see a whole new array of landscape and features. You really get to broaden your vision," Zwonitzer said.

Wyeth exhibit worth the trip to K.C.

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

"Andrew Wyeth: Autobiography," which is on exhibition at the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art, is definitely worth the drive to Kansas City, Mo. — contrary to what most critics will have you think.

Rarely are Kansans treated to two blockbuster exhibits in one year, "The Treasures of the Czars" and the Wyeth show — although the artistic merit of the Czar exhibit is highly debatable.

Wyeth isn't as easily dismissible as critics, artists, and snobs in general would like him to be. The fact he has never resided in New York City, shocking as it may seem, doesn't make him any less of an artist.

His work isn't entirely that of a sentimental realist, either. Yes, he paints very realistically, sometimes photo-realistically, but that isn't his only intention. His realist perspective suggests universal meanings.

In paintings such as "Overflow," a nude of the infamous Helga Testorf in bed sleeping, Wyeth exhibits this timelessness with a concern for the shapes of light and dark. His newer paintings, exhibited in the small, final

EXHIBITION

► Andrew Wyeth's exhibition will be at the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City, Mo. until Nov. 26. Students tickets are $3 Saturdays and $5 other days. The Nelson is open from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesday through Thursday, 10 a.m.-9 p.m. Friday, 10 a.m.-5 p.m. Saturday, and noon-5 p.m. Sunday. Call (816) 751-1246 for more info.

gallery, are almost totally concerned with light.

Born in 1917 in Chadds Ford, Pa., Wyeth grew up under the wing of his father, illustrator N.C. Wyeth.

By 1937, Wyeth's art had gained a following in New York. However, it wasn't until 1948, when the Museum of Modern Art in New York purchased "Christina's World," did Wyeth become a well-known force in the art world.

I'll admit I was skeptical about seeing the Wyeth exhibit. I considered Wyeth a simple realist with no further agenda. I saw his works as sad, monochromatic (his color scheme ranges from brown to brown) pictures of American life — a sort of cynical Norman Rockwell.

But walking through the tightly-packed exhibit galleries allows people to forget their preconceived notions of the artist and see another side: Wyeth is an artist totally preoccupied with the notion of death and existence. His preoccupations arose in 1945 after his father and a nephew were killed when their car was hit by a train near Chadds Ford.

His nudes, especially the controversial Helga pictures, and the paintings of his neighbors, the Kuerners of Chadds Ford, and the Olsons and the Ericksons of Cushing, Maine, are not simple portraits but voyeuristic invasions of others' lives.

Even "Distant Thunder," a portrait of Wyeth's wife, Betsy, whom he married in 1940, lounging in grass after picking berries, was painted unbeknownst to her.

Perhaps it's this voyeuristic tendency of Wyeth's that makes the show so disturbing. Sure, we'd all like to know what is occurring in our neighbors' homes, but we don't walk in and start painting. Wyeth's neighbors allowed him that opportunity.

To keep his work in context, one must remember Wyeth is a homebody — the artist equivalent to the Brontë sisters.

He has not traveled extensively, never received formal artistic training outside of his father, and has never jumped on the -ism bandwagon.

Whatever you think of Wyeth, he's assured a spot on the map of 20th-century American art.

This exhibit, the first major show of his work since 1976's lambasted "The Two Worlds of Andrew Wyeth" at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, is one of the first times Wyeth's entire body of important work can be viewed in one place.

The only glaring omission is his widely known painting "Christina's World," which was too fragile to travel.

The Nelson showing is the only U.S. tour date. The other three exhibition stops were in Japan, where Wyeth has remained popular for decades. The show closes Nov. 26.

► FINANCIAL AID

Students already have intersession money

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Students who apply for financial aid for intersession might be surprised to find they have already received it.

"When students apply for financial aid, they're applying for an entire academic year," said Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance.

"Therefore, it is included as part of a full academic year, rather than a separate session," he said.

He said financial assistance looks at the cost of intersession and incorporates that amount with regular semester amounts to ensure that all or most educational costs are covered.

If a student hasn't used up the entire grant within the academic school year, the rest can be applied toward intersession or summer school.

It's a transfer of funds, not an addition or subtraction of them.

"Most don't qualify because they have already received the maximum eligibility," Moeder said.

Cynthia Trent, intersession coordinator, said intersession costs would vary because students pay per credit hour according to their grade level and residency status.

Undergraduate residents pay $71 per hour, and non-residents pay $261 per hour.

Graduate residents pay $100 per hour, and non-residents pay $304 per hour.

Trent said students who did not attend this regular fall semester must pay 87 cents per day for student/health fees.

Intersession, which is a revved-up version of semester classes compacted into two to three weeks of intense learning, consists of 40-45 different classes.

Classes are determined by the faculty who try to offer courses generally not offered during the usual semester. Examples are African philosophy, medical terminology and history of rock music.

INTERSESSION

► Winter intersession will be Jan. 2-19. Enrollment for intersession will be Dec. 5 at Willard 217 or Dec. 6 at 131 College Court.

"Some curriculums accept certain courses as electives or as requirements," Trent said.

She said it was important for students to check with their advisers to see which courses would count toward their curriculum goal.

"Spring and winter are the two well-known intersessions, but we've just installed the third one that is held in August," Trent said.

Trent said this winter's intersession is going to last for three weeks, and students are allowed to take four credit hours without their dean's permission.

Spring's intersession will be two weeks long, and students are allowed to take three credit hours without permission.

Trent said students take intersession course for several reasons.

"Most take courses because they want to move through their educational program faster to graduate sooner," Trent said.

Students have the opportunity to concentrate on one specific class of interest without the usual campus distractions.

Students who live nearby but aren't going away on break take advantage of free time by keeping busy in one or more courses.

Some students are just looking to fulfill some required courses in a hurry. K-State makes a concerted effort to help students with their financial situation, but students should do the same.

It just takes an application. Moeder said he was surprised by how many students didn't take advantage of the financial opportunities available to them.

Collegian availability wanes due to higher costs

We know it is tougher to find Collegians. You, the readers, have called us to let us know you can't get your paper.

Can't find a Collegian these days? It is true there are fewer Collegians being printed and distributed. We are printing 11,500 copies. That is 2,500 copies fewer than in past semesters.

The Board of Student Publications Inc. decided to cut back our circulation in the earlier in the semester.

You might ask why. Well, newsprint costs have skyrocketed. The cost of the paper we print on has risen almost 40 percent in the past six months.

In the past two years, the cost of newsprint has more than doubled. Student Publications Inc. is trying to protect itself from the rising costs of paper.

We know it is tougher to find Collegians. You, the readers, have called us to let us know you can't get your paper.

We are not saying you should stop calling us. You should be calling us, but you should also be calling other people to let them know about your dilemma.

Call members of the Board of Student Publications Inc.

Tell them what you think of not being able to read "Calvin and Hobbes" or do the crossword puzzle.

If you call 532-6555, the Student Publications office can give you the names and telephone numbers of board members.

Call the senators who represent you in Student Senate.

Tell them what you think of not being able to read football game coverage from the weekend.

The number for the Student Governing Association is 532-6541. You can also look up the name of your representative on the World Wide Web. Point your Web browser to its home page (<http://www.ksu.edu/~stugov/>).

Tell them all this and more, because you can't find a Collegian when you go to class in the morning.

Leaving logic behind while entering

Microsoftland

My horoscope for last week told me I was an "oblique whirlwind" of a person. I don't know what that means, but I think it's an insult.

I kept reading anyway. It went on to tell me that something crossing Sagittarius spelled good luck for me, "Financial windfall ahead! Also, look for unexpected romantic overtures."

That sounded good, but the horoscope closed with the ominous, "Beware the blue box."

Not surprisingly, I experienced no financial windfall and didn't notice any unexpected romantic overtures, either. The bit about the blue box was dead on, though.

A friend of mine who just bought an IBM-compatible PC called me last week, wanting to know if I could help him install Windows 95, since I, also, have an IBM-compatible computer.

I agreed to help, and we opened the box containing Windows 95 that afternoon. The box was blue.

If only I had remembered my horoscope, I could have left right then and gone off looking for unexpected romance, but instead, my friend and I entered Microsoftland.

First, it wouldn't install. Neither of us are computer dummies. I'm familiar with Microsoft's Dos and Microsoft's earlier versions of Windows. Joe knows Macintoshes inside and out. Neither of us could get the computer to respond to any sort of keystroke or mouse movement after a certain point.

After several hours of pouring through the manual, analyzing the reference books, and even consulting "Windows 95 for Dummies," we resorted to the final evil — we called one of the Microsoft support numbers.

The guy at the other end was eager to help, but was, unfortunately, stupid. He couldn't grasp what our problem was. After 10 minutes of misunderstandings, I eventually decided to explain, slowly and carefully, every step we had followed and every response the computer had given.

After all of this, there was a long pause, and the Microsoft guy said, "Well, um, it ought to be running, then."

I hung up on him, and we put everything back in the blue box.

In an interview with a German magazine, Bill Gates said there were no "essential bugs" in their software, whatever that means.

Gates ascribed the vast frustration that everyone reports to "user error." If there's a problem, Gates said, it's not a problem with the program.

Windows has ruined personal computers, as far as I can tell. Once, a long time ago, personal computers were getting faster and faster and easier to use.

Then, Microsoft stole the idea of an icon-based operating system from Apple, and Windows was born.

Now, although computers keep getting faster and faster, the applications on these computers run slower and slower.

It would be all right if Windows was just some sort of file manager, but it doesn't stop there. New software is written specifically for Windows, and brings with it all of Windows' problems.

An example — once upon a time, WordPerfect was a great word processor. It had a screen that, except for the bottom line, contained only the text of the document.

It made up for not having all those mysterious buttons and icons cluttering up the screen by having one of the best on-line help utilities ever.

Also, it was fast. When you hit a key, something happened — no wait, no little hourglass. But then, Windows became so prominent that WordPerfect changed. The Windows version of WordPerfect is essentially the same as Microsoft's Word. It has the same insufficient help function, the same creeping-slow processing and the same cluttered screen.

Even WordPerfect 6.0 for Dos tried to be more Windows-like, and thus, runs at about half the speed of WordPerfect 5.1, which can do 98 percent of what WordPerfect 6.0 can do.

I would say 30 percent of all the programs that are Windows-oriented I've ever used have had serious flaws.

Not bugs, according to Gates. He said problems with Microsoft software are sociological in nature, rather than technical.

Like Roman emperors, Gates should take a day to live like a real person. He should go out and try to install Windows 95 on some mid-range computer with only the stupid guy at the end of the telephone to help.

But, like those Roman emperors, he's not likely to learn anything from it.

Joe's opinion is Gates was born under a full solar eclipse and is destined to build a huge computer empire (check), rule it with an iron fist (check), and eventually be strangled by his most-trusted programmers (yet to come).

It's written in the stars.

Single-payer health care protects standard of living

In the Declaration of Independence, our founding fathers set down several basic human rights, those being life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Later, they adopted the Bill of Rights, which further outlined what rights we can expect in this country.

Absent from those rights, however, was the right to health care. To provide many of the others, though, it too must be given.

How can a person have life without treatment for a disease that is killing them? How can they have liberty or pursue happiness if they are crippled or brain damaged by the lack of preventive medicine?

This country does not ensure these needs will be met. Therefore, as Joycelyn Elders said in her speech at K-State, "We don't have a health-care system. What we have is a very expensive-sick care system."

There are many reasons why it is so expensive. A large share of the problem, however, can be laid at the feet of the insurance industry.

Insurance companies refuse to cover high-risk people and are too expensive for many people to afford. According to the Missouri Coalition for Single Payer Health Care (MOSP), almost 40 million people in the United States have no health insurance.

Because of this, many emergency procedures have to be performed by hospitals when they have little hope of being paid fully.

This increases the price that hospitals charge to people able to pay. This, in turn, drives up insurance prices.

Insurance companies do little to encourage preventive health care. Because of this, problems that could have been treated easily and cheaply at early stages become expensive, painful ordeals.

Many insurance companies own hospitals and pharmaceutical companies.

They steer their customers to these hospitals, causing competing hospitals to have to double up on expensive technology.

Then the insurance companies require drugs their pharmaceutical companies produce to be prescribed.

This system leads to lots of waste, and therefore, higher premiums.

The solution to this problem is a single-payer health care system, with universal coverage and an emphasis on preventive medicine. Under a single-payer health-care plan, the government would guarantee health care for all citizens by becoming the sole source of insurance.

Single-payer health care would provide universal coverage with everyone eligible for benefits no matter what their employment, age or health status.

It would provide comprehensive benefits and high quality health care for everyone. It gives the patient the right to choose their own providers, and it gives providers the right to base medical decisions on health criteria alone.

Back during the health-care debates two years ago, quite a bit of propaganda was released by insurance companies regarding single-payer health care. This primarily took the form of comparisons between our own system and the Canadian single-payer method.

Many of these comparisons were distortions or outright lies.

Canadians only have to wait longer for elective surgery. This is surgery that might not be necessary. In general, Canadians get care at the same and, in many cases, faster rates than people who live in the United States.

It is untrue that Canadians are flocking across the border to get health care in the United States.

In fact, according to MOSP, in 1994 almost twice as many Americans went to Canada for health care as Canadians came to the United States to be treated.

Single-payer health care is not socialized medicine. The government would not own the hospitals or the pharmaceutical companies. People would actually have more choice in which provider they wished to use.

According to the General Accounting Office, the adoption of a single-payer system would save 10 percent of the national health care budget. One trillion dollars is spent annually on health, meaning this would be a saving of 100 billion dollars. Most of these savings would come from the elimination of wasteful bureaucracy and unnecessary profits.

According to MOSP, the United States is the only industrialized nation that does not provide health care to all of its citizens. It is high time we caught up.

As a nation, we must get away from profit-driven criteria in our decision making. Our standard of living has been decreasing yearly as we allow the rich to get richer and the poor to get poorer.

Let's not let the insurance companies hold us back from improving life in this country.

Don't sacrifice your liberty to their inequitable system, or the pursuit of happiness will end abruptly for far too many of us.

Manhattan mayor Edith Stunkel spoke about leadership in action Monday night during Leadership Week '95, sponsored by Blue Key National Honor Fraternity.

"Am I more of a leader because I am a mayor? Will I be less of a leader next year when I'm not the mayor?" Stunkel said.

The answer is no, she said. Leaders are not defined by their title or by how many perks they have, Stunkel said.

Leadership can be defined by who is on top of the pyramid, she said.

Elected leaders take on the persona that it is their job to make decisions. Democracy is given a bad name by elected officials who stop depending on those who elected them, Stunkel said.

Leadership can also be defined by who is at the bottom of the pyramid. Stunkel said leadership can be made up of more leaders than followers.

"First you have a vision. Then you share it with others who, in turn, articulate it to others," Stunkel said.

Responsibility is shared by leadership, and part of the responsibility is educating people about their part in leadership, she said.

Jennifer Dunn, senior in food science, said sharing leadership is hard to envision, but it is the type of leadership that really works.

"It is definitely possible, and it works really well," Dunn said.

Stunkel said she always liked being behind the scenes, and visions for change motivated her to run for office.

"Leadership is not about what you do or how you do it," Stunkel said. "Leadership is where you're coming from rather than where you're going."

Leadership skills transfer to life after college

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

Not only will classroom knowledge transfer to life after K-State, but so will leadership skills.

"There's a lot of life after college," said Kelly Fletcher, senior in biology and pre-physical therapy and co-coordinator of Leadership Week '95.

Sue Maes, member of the technology grant writing team at K-State, discussed leadership roles in community organizations Monday afternoon in the K-State Student Union.

She said many times in a group, women's voices are hard to bring out.

"Men don't hear our voices," she said.

She said it is an interesting phenomena, and she does not know what it will take for women to be heard.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life and director of leadership development, said men need to learn how to listen.

"Men need to not only listen, but be resocialized about the different levels of communication," Franklin said.

Community leaders of both genders need to be good listeners, build consensus and make decisions, Maes said.

She also said community leaders need to empower others during the decision-making process.

One way to do this is with small groups.

"You can get too passive in a large group. I think when you're in a small group, you're expected to have an idea," she said.

Involvement in organizations is important to Maes, she said.

"If I can't give something to it, be a person who can make a difference, I don't need to be there," she said.

Responsibility, honesty need to be understood

Karin Thomas
staff reporter

Leaders need to understand the law of origin, the law of total responsibility and the law of honesty, said Larry Dixon, the assistant superintendent of the Junction City School District.

Dixon presented "Choices in Leadership" Monday in the K-State Student Union as a part of Blue Key Leadership Week.

"As leaders, we need to understand the law of origin," Dixon said. "In the area of leadership, we can't forget the reason we're there."

"Keep in mind what is best for the organization."

Dixon also said the law of total responsibility meant leaders must take responsibility for everything.

"We look for blame, but the reality as a leader is that you're responsible for everything that happens. And if you don't believe that, then you can't lead," he said.

Leaders also need to follow the law of total honesty, Dixon said.

"Choosing to be honest runs the risk of abandonment or rejection," he said. "But if you don't have this type of commitment, you will be abandoning the group without ever leaving it."

Understanding human nature is an important part of leadership, he said.

"Giving people choices is the most powerful way to make people feel needed," he said.

Lorenza Lockett, freshman in social work, said she enjoyed what he said about having control of one's destiny and not compromising because of pressure.

"Making people come up to standards, and choice is the most powerful thing you can have," she said.

Laurie Walters, junior in family studies and human services and community services, said Dixon presented a couple of new concepts.

"Validation for me is what I got out of it," she said.

With one exception, we're all in a

Universe made up of 'others'

"It is well to remember that the entire population of the universe, with one trifling exception, is composed of others." John Haynes Holmes, U.S. clergyman (1879-1964)

There are, within that one-sentence homily, two practical considerations for those hoping to glean some benefit from Leadership Week.

First, there are 5,642,151,000 human "others" on earth, and they constitute a diverse bunch of individuals.

If one attempted to count up to that number by ones, in one-second intervals, it would take one hour to count to 3,600 and more than five hours to count the 20,000 students enrolled at K-State.

It would take 18 hours to count the population of Riley County (67,139); four weeks to count the population of Kansas (2,500,000); about eight years to count the population of the United States (250,000,000 plus); and finally, it would take about 175 years to count the population of the world at its current level.

That's a lot of "others," and no two think, act or look alike.

Consider the world has recognized five main religions — Judaism in 1300 B.C., Buddhism in 525 B.C., Hinduism in 500 B.C., Christianity in the fourth century A.D. and Islam in 622 A.D.

Consider the largest religion in the United States is Christianity with 12 generally recognized denominations: Baptists, Church of Christ, Episcopalians, Jehovah's Witnesses, Lutherans, Methodists, Mormons, Orthodox, Pentecostal, Presbyterians, Roman Catholics and United Church of Christ.

Of course, there are many other religions, denominations and sub-denominations, all of which tend to ponder a similar question regarding the meaning of life and death, a question not so trifling for most of us.

Further consider there are more than 300 countries on earth spread over six continents.

The most populated is Asia, which comprises nearly 60 percent of the world's "others." North America (the United States and Canada) comprise only 5 percent. These 300 or so countries speak 12 principal languages in descending order: Mandarin, Hindi, Spanish, English, Bengali, Arabic, Russian, Portuguese, Japanese, German, French and Malay-Indonesian.

In the United States alone, the top 25 languages other than English spoken at home by Americans are (in descending order) Spanish, French, German, Italian, Chinese, Tagalog, Polish, Korean, Vietnamese, Portuguese, Japanese, Greek Arabic, Hindi, Russian, Yiddish, Thai, Persian, French Creole, Armenian, Navajo, Hungarian, Hebrew, Dutch and Mon-Khmer.

Imagine the myriad of demographic information not yet considered would further identify and label the diversity among these more than five billion "others."

And imagine the challenge to those who envision themselves in leadership roles grappling with the fact that the world, in a very short period of time, has become mostly influenced by a global economy.

What is made over there by "others," may be purchased here; what is made here may be purchased over there by "others." Most successful entrepreneurs realize the marketplace is much greater than Manhattan, Riley County or Kansas. Market share can encompass the globe.

Second, that "trifling exception" — you — may be able to develop qualities that could leverage your individuality into leadership.

Education doesn't end at commencement. It really only just begins. Indeed, what you should be learning at K-State is how to learn.

Learning is a lifelong activity, the main frustration of which is the realization that the more we learn, the more we realize how much we don't know.

By commencement, an educated person should be able to write and speak clearly, have a rudimentary knowledge of the arts and sciences, grasp human historical development, have some abstract reasoning skills, some specific knowledge of a particular field, and most importantly (if one is to be a leader) have a vision for a better world.

The most important ingredient for leadership is not charisma (although some may achieve it in the process of being leaders), but vision and tenacity.

Without vision, life may be reduced to a drone-like existence of simply counting the days between paychecks. But by accumulating knowledge and understanding, the leap to a vision for a better world (or mousetrap) is not that big a step.

Leadership needs one more ingredient — tenacity. The perseverance and courage to see one's vision through to fruition.

In my Public Speaking II classes, we deliver campus-issue persuasive speeches.

The students are urged to have a better idea for the University and to find a way to implement change.

They are urged to leverage their idea by both seeking the support of Student Senate and by publishing a letter to the editor in the Collegian.

In spite of many good ideas resulting in effective persuasive speeches, few possess the tenacity to actually take that next step, to risk their vision in the marketplace of ideas by running the gambit of Student Senate approval and Collegian readership.

The idea may have been good, but its author lacked tenacity; it took too much risk and effort to put it before the University.

No one can make you a leader. It ought to be clear, however, that our diverse world holds a whirlwind of opportunities for those who seek the kind of human understanding, knowledge, vision and tenacity that it takes to transform a bicycle into a flying machine, or a world at war into a world of peace.

Graduate combines success, science to launch space shuttles

Kim Kircher
staff reporter

Mixing space shuttles and success was the story behind the first speaker for Leadership Week '95.

Gerry Oppliger, president of Lockheed Martin Space Operations, graduated from K-State in 1955, with a bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering.

Lockheed is an engineering company that works with Kennedy Space Center.

"My company prepares the shuttle fleet for launch. The shuttle is the most complex flying machine yet when it is landing its a glider using no power," he said.

Oppliger, who is originally from Ransom, said he is a typical-ordinary person living in an exciting and wonderful world.

Leadership is not like robotics, but instead it is looking people in the eye, getting them excited, he said.

Loyalty, honesty, diligence, dedication, caring and devoting yourself to a meaningful cause are some important characteristics leaders need to have, Oppliger said.

"Respond to the dynamic environment, work very hard, expect the unexpected everyday and attitude determines altitude," he said.

Nothing is too big or too hard to overcome, and remember that the sun always comes up no matter what, he said.

Oppliger was the first of 15 speakers sponsored by Blue Key.

"Today's speaker was insightful and gave us a realistic view of what role leadership has in real life," said Nabeeha Kazi, senior in political science and public relations and co-director of leadership.

The speakers have all different backgrounds, yet focus on the same topic.

"We found the speakers by contacting the deans of the K-State colleges and asking for suggestion," said Kelly Fletcher, senior in pre-physical therapy and co-director of leadership week.

ARGUMENTS COMPLETE IN KING TRIAL

NEW YORK (AP) — The jury in the insurance fraud trial of boxing promoter Don King began deliberations Monday after lawyers finished closing arguments. King was charged last year with nine counts of wire fraud, a charge that carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine per count.

Money, money, money and the week in sports

Before I write any more of this column, I have to inform my readers of a important decision I have made.

I have decided to sell my column to another section of the Collegian.

I hate to do it, but I have to. I love writing for the sports section, but one thing came in the way of me staying here.

Money.

I got an offer from another section of the paper, and I had to take it. See, a good friend of mine, Art Modell, told me I wasn't making enough money in the sports section.

He told me the sports section gave me no other choice but to sell my column to the highest bidder.

So unless the sports section can come up with one last offer, it's goodbye sports section.

Modell put it to me this way, "Son (he likes to call me son), in this type of business, you can't rely on loyalty. You have to be thinking of yourself 100 percent. Take the money, son."

A review of the world of sports this weekend: I am proud of our Wildcats after their 49-7 defeat of Iowa State this past weekend. The week before the game, I heard many reports of Cat players reporting stiffness in the neck. It was the same stiffness reported two years ago before the Iowa State game. I investigated this report before game time, it turned out the report was actually made from Lawrence.

Speaking of Lawrence, could anyone else hear the pounding KU was receiving Saturday? I am tired of hearing coaches and a certain Kansas City Star columnist say KU is not as bad as the score indicated. And if this turnover hadn't happened, or if this, or if ... Nebraska would have been in the battle of their lives.

The fact is if KU had not committed all of those turnovers, the score would have been about the same. If the turnovers don't happen, the Nebraska offense gets more time on the field, leading to more offensive yards and offensive plays.

Have fun at the Alamo Bowl, KU fans.

The Missouri football program is ... how do I say this nicely? Pathetic.

Next week, they will finish their season against Iowa State. They will lose and finish the Big 8 season without a win.

Rumor has it Coach Larry Smith is replacing some of next year's non-conference opponents with Akron, Ohio and Manhattan High School (I'm putting $20 on the Indians already).

This past weekend was opening day for hunters in Kansas and Missouri. Down in Oklahoma, this weekend will be opening day on all Schnellenbergers. Hunting officials said they are not hard to find. Schnellenbergers wear a bright red coat and will be running with their tails between their legs.

Heisman update:

1. Eddie George. 2. Tommie Frazier. 3. Troy Davis. 4. Keyshawn Johnson. 5. Danny Wuerffel.

George's performance against one of the better defenses in the nation was amazing. In case you missed it, 36 carries for 314 yards and three touchdowns.

If we could have put red and blue uniforms on the Cowboys and purple on the 49ers, we could have seen a repeat of the K-State-KU game. The game of the year turned out to be total domination by the 49ers. You can't expect to give the 49ers — or any team — a 24-point lead and expect to come back with Wade Wilson at quarterback.

This loss will be good for the Cowboys. It will teach them to not overlook anybody, no matter who is playing or not playing.

The real game of the year should come in a couple of weeks on Thanksgiving, when the Cowboys meet the Chiefs in Irving, Texas.

In case you were not one of the few who made it to the men's basketball opener Saturday night, you're in for a surprise this year. His name is Johnnie Williams. He's big, strong and is going to be the Big 8 Beast of the Year.

Live: Without a net

■ Club competes while searching for permanent practice facility

Shana Newell
staff writer

With 13 men on this year's squad, only six of them are returners from last year.

Led by setter and club president Jason Dana, middle hitters Tom Swanson and Oliver Wischmeyer, outside hitters Matt Spichal and Tracey Koenke and defensive specialist Scott Hull, the men's volleyball team has spent this semester finding practice areas and people to join the team.

Dana, senior in chemical engineering, said although there were some problems early in the season finding practice space, the team has everything settled.

"The school is thinking about having sports clubs get Ahearn at a set time next semester," he said.

"That will really help out a lot."

Recruiting has primarily been by word of mouth, Dana said.

"People we have played with, we tell them about the club, and they tell others," he said.

"We really encourage people to come out and practice with us, and a lot of times they stay to play."

The club gets its funding from three areas. Dues that come straight from the player's pockets account for some of the team funding, but fund raisers and money from the sports clubs fund help out a lot, Dana said.

To raise money, the team will play host to a tournament. Dana said sometime in January or early February, the squad will be sending out fliers to other club presidents inviting them to come to K-State.

The money they receive from that fund raiser helps the Wildcats travel to other tournaments.

Dana said the team's goal was to enter the Club National Tournament in April. To enter the tournament, the club must compete in four other recognized tournaments.

The team competed in a tournament in Lincoln last month. They returned home with two wins and four losses.

There will be another tournament in the spring at Iowa State. Dana said right now, the team was just waiting for other clubs to organize tournaments.

Koenke, senior in turf management, said he has played with the team for three years. In that time, he said, the club has changed a lot.

"Personnel is the big change. There's been a lot of ups and downs," Koenke said. "We had a great team but then lost a lot of those players. We had to rebuild. We're still in a rebuilding stage now."

The squad battled last Wednesday night following the women's volleyball match against Kansas. However, they did not fare as well as the women did, dropping the match 3-1.

The Cats lost the first game 15-6 but bounced back to win in a close 15-13 second game. The feeling of victory did not last long, as the Jayhawks won games three and four with scores of 15-12 and 15-9 respectively.

Dana said the team was expecting a tough match against the Hawks.

"We played their B-team in Lincoln. We beat them there, but it wasn't easy, so we knew their A-team would be tough to beat," he said. "Kansas had a lot of new players who are really tall. We didn't really know what to expect from them."

Koenke said the Cats did not play as well as they could have, which contributed to the loss.

"If we had played as well as we possibly could have, we could have beat them," he said. "We didn't play bad, but we didn't play as good as we could have."

The passing game was what hurt the Cats the most, Dana said.

"The limiting reactant was our passing. When our passing hurts, it makes it hard to get a good set," he said. "Part of it is getting me in sync with the middle hitters. We have to work on that."

Students interested in joining the men's volleyball club can call Jason Dana at 539-3959.

Women, men both finish 4th, Betancourt qualifies for NCAA

■ Illness stunts men's performance, Betancourt is only qualifier

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

The cross country season for all but one K-State runner ended Saturday at the NCAA District V Championships in Stillwater, Okla.

Irma Betancourt was the only runner from either team to advance to the NCAA Championships Nov. 20 in Ames, Iowa. The senior finished in eighth place with a time of 18:07.

As a team, the women finished in fourth place. Missouri and Iowa State, the only two ranked teams in the women's field, gained automatic bids to the NCAA Championships.

"There were too many Iowa State and Nebraska people between Irma and Samantha (McNamara)," Coach Terry Drake said.

After Betancourt, McNamara garnered All-District recognition with a 23rd-place finish. She was followed by Charity Swartz in 27th,

Cristy Swartz in 28th and Ashlie

Kinton in 29th.

"Irma, Samantha, Charity, Cristy and Ashlie all ran their best race of the season — and for some of them, the best race ever. So it's hard for me to be terribly disappointed. But we hit a day when everyone else ran good."

TERRY DRAKE

K-STATE CROSS COUNTRY COACH

On the men's side, K-State also finished fourth, with Oklahoma State and Iowa State gaining the automatic bids. Ryan Clive-Smith finished in ninth place followed by David Dominguez in 17th, Paul Birnbaum in 31st and John Thorpe in 36th. Clive-Smith and Dominguez each received All-District recognition.

"I'm always disappointed when we don't make it, and we had a chance in the men's," Drake said.

"But our five didn't have a good race, Ryan had been sick all week and hadn't run."

"John didn't run well and Zach just didn't have it."

With 400 meters left, Clive-Smith was still in position to get an at-large bid, but ran out of gas.

"He was spent and just jogged in," Drake said.

► TENNIS

Bietau: team needs experience

Rich Peffley
staff reporter

The K-State women's tennis squad wrapped up fall tournament play Friday at the Rolex Regional Championships at the University of Utah.

The Wildcats played in six matches on the final day of tournament play and went an even 3-and-3.

In consolation singles action, senior Karina Kuregian defeated Kim Webster of Kansas in three sets 6-7, 6-3, 7-6 (7-3). Kuregian then defeated Annette Hartman of Wichita State 6-0, 6-2 before falling in the third round to Claudia Guterrez of New Mexico in a tough three-setter, 4-6, 6-1, 7-6 (7-5).

"Karina didn't play very well," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "If she does play well, she doesn't have the results she had."

Sophomore Dinah Watson also competed in consolation singles. Watson dropped Taryn Martin of Tulsa 6-0, 6-3 in the first round. In round two, she fell in a tough three-setter to Weber State's Ande Tulp 6-3, 4-6, 7-6 (7-0).

"Dinah played as well as anyone we had in the tournament," Bietau said. "She has improved in practice and has consistently improved in her matches."

In the main doubles draw, K-State's team of Kuregian and Yana Dorodnova was defeated by Meraz and Guterrez of New Mexico, 2-6, 6-1, 6-4. The New Mexico doubles victory gave Claudia Guterrez victories against Kuregian in both singles and doubles action during the tournament.

"This tournament points out that we have players capable of good results," Bietau said. "We just need more matches."

The Rolex Regional Tournament is the last action of the fall season for the Cats tennis squad. The Cats will next take to the courts for the spring duals season. The first match of the spring season is Jan. 26.

► ASBURY SIGNS WESTERN KANSAS STAR

K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury announced the signing of 6-foot-6-inch Josh Reid Monday. Reid is a senior from Brewster.

"We feel that Josh will be a very fine addition to our program both on and off the court," Asbury said. "He's got terrific instincts for the game and a great work ethic. Right away, I see him as a three-man. But later in his career, I think he'll be capable of playing in the back court."

As a junior, Reid led the Brewster Bulldogs to the 1A state championship, averaging 28 points and 8.7 rebounds per game. He shot 68 percent from the field and 86 percent from the free throw line.

This summer, Reid joined the Colorado Fleet Feet, an AAU team that advanced to the final 16 in two national tournaments.

"We always knew he was a player — but it wasn't until we watched him play this summer that we knew he was a Big 8 player," Asbury said. "He more than held his own against some of the better players in the country."

Reid is K-State's only signee so far. He chose the Wildcats instead of Stanford, Marquette, Colorado State, DePaul, Kansas and South Alabama.

► CONVERSATIONAL ENGLISH PROGRAM

Students teach others English, learn about culture

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Going to movies, discussing classes and becoming friends are all part of K-State's Conversational English Program.

Jim Endrizzi, graduate student in college student personnel and graduate assistant for the International Student Center, pairs U.S. students with international students for the program.

International students who are struggling to understand and speak English are able to practice conversational skills with a volunteer American for one or two hours each week.

"The program itself is very unstructured as long as the pairs get together one hour or more a week and speak English," Endrizzi said. "Most of the international students know English, but they don't understand the dialects, the cultural references or the slang."

Endrizzi attempts to match same-sex pairs in similar areas of study and with common interests.

"We're not doing this to set up relationships. In fact, the international students often end up viewing their American counterpart as a friend or tutor," Endrizzi said. "The idea is not just to pair up for conversational reasons but so that they hopefully talk about what they are going through and the cultural differences."

Most international students learn about the program during an orientation meeting each semester, while U.S. students are recruited from University Experience classes and posted fliers.

"One of the screening questions we find out from the American students is whether or not they've had any language training," Endrizzi said. "Usually, if a student has tried to learn another language, they know that it takes a little bit of understanding, time and patience."

The International Student Center is one meeting place for the 70 pairs presently working together. About 130 pairs are matched each year.

"We attempt to pair them up as soon as possible each semester, but we are constantly getting international students throughout the semester that need a partner," Endrizzi said. "We plan activities to help the pairs renew their contact. We understand that occasionally pairs fall out of contact during a busy week, but they shouldn't be forgotten."

Each pair is given a list of suggested topics, but usually that only serves as a springboard to discuss their individual interests, Endrizzi said.

Phouvieng Khounthasenh, freshman in medical technology, joined the program because she said she thought meeting people from other countries would be fun.

"My partner is from Korea, and we met the first time to go see a movie and talked a little there," Khounthasenh said. "I've met a lot of international people and went to her house and had some Korean food. In Kansas it sometimes feels like we are isolated from the rest of the world."

John McKenzie, graduate student in geography, started working with his partner three weeks after classes started.

"We just met and talked about topics. We stopped using the suggested list of topics because it wasn't a class," McKenzie said. "We are students and started talking about realistic things, like how our weeks were."

Matched with a partner from China, McKenzie and his partner discussed music and cultural differences.

"We are all humans in the world. I'm from a really small town in Kansas, and there are a lot of stereotypes about people from different countries," McKenzie said. "I think many of us assume the foreign students are just here studying, and we don't understand how hard and difficult it is for them to adjust."

Although they are still learning about each other, McKenzie said he and his partner have found common ground.

"There are quite a few differences, but we have classes and problems we go through," McKenzie said. "Our cultures are different, and we maybe do different things on the weekends but face many of the same things each day."

► JOB TRAINING

Program assists farmers in finding other kinds of jobs

Free counseling and job training are available through the Work Opportunities for Rural Kansas program for farmers facing the possibility of a career change.

WORKS is a job training program that assists farmers through the transition period when they may be seeking off-farm employment.

The program is administered by Kansas Legal Services Inc. and is funded by the Kansas Department of Human Resources.

The program allows the participants to choose the kind of training or education they are interested in pursuing. Tuition assistance, job seeking skills and career counseling are some of the services offered.

Eligible participants include financially distressed Kansas farmers, ranchers and their family members who receive their primary income from farming.

Susan Durando, WORKS director, said if a participant wants to pursue an educational program, fees, books and tuition will be provided at any Kansas school that accepts federal funds.

Day-care costs and mileage to and from school are covered by the program.

If a participant chooses to go through job training, the WORKS program will pay employers to hire participants and train them, Durando said.

Many farming and ranching families have already successfully completed the program.

Durando said since the program began three years ago, almost 350 farming and ranching families have been through the training and educa-

Students are making big money betting on sports

Open up the sports section of any major newspaper, and you'll see it.

Walk into a fraternity or residence hall — it's there.

Gambling on professional and college sports has become a hit with college students across the country.

The problem has gotten so big that earlier this year Sports Illustrated did a three-part story on the situation on several college campuses.

According to the Sports Illustrated article, at least 23 percent of college students gamble on sports at least once a week.

Illegal gambling operations have come to the public's attention at Michigan State, Maine, Rhode Island, Bryant College, Texas, Arizona State, Northwestern and Maryland.

The problem was so large at some of the schools that the gambling charges included college athletes (Maine, Rhode Island, Bryant, Maryland and Northwestern).

But, do those statistics fit in here at K-State?

Are K-State students illegally gambling on sports?

"It's bigger than a lot of people think," said Mike, a senior, who agreed to speak only if he was identified by a fictitious name.

"It's addicting. Once you win you're hooked. You spend time on the couch watching a bunch of games that you would have never cared about before. It's easy cash ... if you win."

Tom, who bets on both the NFL and college football every week, said he knows many people who bet on sports here at K-State.

"It's huge," Tom said. "It's fun to sit and talk with them about your bets. You can really have a great weekend when you win $500. You can buy everyone drinks."

Kevin, who lives in a fraternity, said almost everyone in his house gambles.

"They call on the telephone to a bookie, and place bets through him," Kevin said. "I think it's a problem that no one wants to talk about. But, it's here just like other campuses all across the country."

Sports gambling at K-State and across the country comes in many different forms, but betting through a bookie popular with students.

A bookie is someone who takes the odd lines from the newspapers or from Las Vegas and takes bets from bettors. Then the bookies pay when a better wins or collects when the better loses.

Finding a bookie isn't too hard. Usually, the information is passed through word of mouth. Someone knows a bookie, or in some cases someone living in a fraternity or residence hall is a bookie.

James, a K-State senior, said he has run a $3,000-a-month betting operation for almost two years.

"Most of my clients are students," James said. "I take small bets like $30-$40 a bet. I've taken some larger ones, though."

"A lot of people don't know that this goes on this much, but it does. I don't know how many clients I have. I really don't want to tell you either."

College students dealing with bookies all know the language of the trade. Some of the typical conversations include words like juice, vig, teaser, over and under, parlay, quarter ($25) and dollar ($100).

All of these words are slang terms for types of bets. Bets that sometimes end up producing enough money to pay for tuition for a semester.

"It really depends on how much money I win from the week before," Tom said when discussing how much he bets every week.

It's addicting. Once you win, you're hooked. You spend time on the couch watching a bunch of games that you would have never cared about before.

"The most that I've ever won is close to $800. Another friend of mine just won $1,500 last week. I have another friend who won $385. Most of my bets are $50, and I'll make several bets like that during a weekend."

"If I win Saturday on college football, I'll bet the NFL games on Sunday. I think it's just really a fun way to make the games more exciting. It can be profitable, too."

No matter how you look at it, sports gambling is a hit here at K-State. It's a hit despite the fact that betting on sports is illegal in Kansas.

Mary Horsch, director of communications for Kansas attorney general Carla Stovall, said people convicted of gambling in Kansas can face fines along with jail time.

"Oh yeah. It's illegal," Horsch said. "According to the statute, it would be a Class B misdemeanor. They could face not more than six months in a county jail or face a fine of not more than $1,000."

"I know that our department hasn't prosecuted a gambling case, but several counties throughout the state have."

However, most of the students involved don't care that their actions are against the law.

"The thought that this is illegal has never crossed my mind," Tom said.

Kevin said no one in his house is concerned about getting caught.

"We all know that this is illegal," Kevin said. "But not everyone sees this as something wrong. We're just in college having fun."

Most students said they continue to bet because they keep winning and see it as an investment. But are these students becoming addicted to gambling at an early age?

Darryl is a member of Gambler's Anonymous in Kansas City. He said he has been in the program for two years, and it is hard for people to stop gambling if they start when they're young.

"It doesn't always start out as a problem," Darryl said. "For most young people it becomes out of control before they admit that they have a problem."

"People have the tendency to try and minimize the problem. They'll say next week will be better. They tell themselves that they are all right, but that's not true. If they attempt to control the problem — by saying they won't bet over a certain amount — it means that they are out of control. It's a form of insanity."

Most students said they don't have a problem, and they can stop whenever they need to.

"I'm in college, and I just want to have some fun now," Tom said. "I know once I graduate and have a family they will come first. It's not like I'm going to sacrifice food for my kids. I can stop once I need to."

Andrew, a senior who places $40 bets every week, said he knows he can stop at any time.

"I'm not a big-time gambler," Andrew said. "Most of my bets are $40. It's easy to get caught up in it, but you have to know when to stop. I know that I can, when I have to."

story by Jeremy Crabtree — photo illustration by Mike Welchans — Due to the fact the types of gambling described in this story are illegal, names have been changed to protect the identity of students.

Civic theater revisits history with 'Harvey'

Portia Sisco
staff writer

Sightings of giant white rabbits are very rare. But Elwood P. Dowd sees one every day in Mary Chase's play, "Harvey."

"Harvey" will be showing at 8 p.m. Nov. 16-19 at the Manhattan Civic Theatre.

Charles Faulk will play Elwood P. Dowd, a man with a giant, invisible bunny as a companion.

Dowd is a laid-back, easy-going man with a mild temper and a tendency to visit bars. His best friend is a giant rabbit named Harvey.

Faulk is charming and amiable as Dowd. He portrays Dowd as an amusing, distracted man who never met a stranger.

Although Dowd appears to be absent-minded, his good nature protects him throughout the play.

Faulk said he never had any problems working around an invisible rabbit.

"It kind of just comes during the course of learning the lines and watching this imaginary character," he said. Faulk played Elwood once before in high school.

"I have more insight now," Faulk said. "I wanted to do it right." Mary Bartholomew plays Elwood's down-to-earth sister, Veta. Bartholomew gives an excellent performance as her character is faced with the decision to commit her brother to a sanitarium. Perhaps Veta is touched along with the audience by her brother's faith and charm.

"It's our dreams that keep us going," Veta says in the play. For Faulk, this is the significance of Harvey. He said he believes that was Chase's message when she wrote Harvey.

This Broadway hit was the first play ever performed by Manhattan Civic Theatre's original cast on Jan. 31, 1955.

Forty years later, Manhattan Civic Theatre will once again perform Harvey in honor of its Ruby Anniversary.

Harvey is directed by Beverly Faw. Faw has been active in the Manhattan Civic Theatre for many years. She directed the play Harvey once before in 1969 in the gymnasium of Eugene Field School.

The stage for the production is unique because of its in-the-round style, which helps audience members feel closer to the actors.

Seating surrounds the stage on four sides, and characters enter and exit the stage from three corners. This gives an interesting point of view from any seat in the theater.

Mary Chase's granddaughter, Sharon Chase Allen, and her husband, George Allen, live in the Manhattan area. Allen said her grandmother was a great supporter of civic theater.

"She would be very tickled that her play was being performed like this," Allen said.

Teddy bear seamstress makes it big

Rachelle Harkness
staff reporter

Creating teddy bears with personality has become not only a hobby, but an extremely successful business.

The KSU Social Club invited Manhattan resident Carol Darling to speak about her experience making dolls and teddy bears for the last 25 years.

Darling's teddy bear business became a reality in 1980, when two women, who worked in an alteration department in Massachusetts, approached Darling with the idea of selling her dolls.

Darling said she had never thought of selling her work, but the idea of making some extra money delighted her.

"It's turned out to be a lot of fun. If it weren't, I wouldn't be doing it," she said.

Darling displayed several of her teddy bears while she spoke.

"I had never heard of her teddy bears until today," Jeanne Leland, member of the K-state social club, said.

The teddy bears Darling creates wear costumes tailored by herself and three women in Poland.

Darling also has a series of Christmas bears that are very popular, she said. She also has a Wizard of Oz collection that includes Dorothy, with red sequin shoes. Victorian bears are among her favorite to create, she said.

"It takes about seven hours to cut the bear out, joint it and stuff it — and another eight hours to clothe and decorate it," she said.

Darling makes about 250 bears a year with each one taking her about 15 hours to make.

"The bears are so interesting, and the stitching is marvelous," Wanda Mae Johnson, secretary of the KSU Social Club, said.

Darling also received a letter from the White House asking her to make an angel ornament. The decoration had several restrictions, including it had to be an angel and she would not make any more to sell.

"We joked about the fact that the only thing they didn't ask for was my thumb print and my two back teeth," she said.

Darling was one of 3,000 artists who submitted 7,000 ornaments to the White House.

"The publicity was wonderful for me," she said.

Darling has also displayed her work at a museum in Maples, Fla., and been involved with the International Teddy Bear Christmas. She has bears for sale in stores all around the United States.

tion programs.

The goal of the program is to help farmers and their families survive both financially and emotionally during the transition period of finding permanent, off-farm employment, Durando said.

Since a participant's pride is involved in seeking the services, the WORKS program concentrates on trust and complete confidentiality with clients.

Linda Hessman, WORKS specialist in Dodge City, said the average age of farmers is 64 and most of the clients have been farming for a minimum of 20 years.

The pride factor comes into play because most people in the program are retiring and the participants are being forced into off-farm jobs because they can no longer successfully farm for various reasons, she said.

"It has always been a sign of weakness for a farmer to seek help," Hessman said.

Many farmers and ranchers are not aware of the services available to them during tough times.

"I believe in what we're doing because there are very few people in the farming community that know what resources are available to them in times of stress," Durando said.

The program focuses on working with families on a personal basis to better serve their specific needs and make them feel more comfortable with the services.

"With this program farmers do not have to walk through the bureaucratic doors to ask for help," Durando said. "Because we are dealing with sensitive issues, we sit down and talk to farmers at kitchen tables on a friendly level."

The head office for the WORKS program is in Topeka and outreach offices are in Dodge City, Manhattan and Topeka.

SERVICES

ing applications.

Services will be slowed down considerably if the federal government is shut down for more than a few days.

"At this point, the Dec. 1 benefits will be the first to be affected by the shutdown," he said. "Right now it's all iffy, but the possibility does exist."

All the necessary administration jobs will be done, but some of the less important paper work will be put off.

Military recruiters left their posts and government contractors will not be paid.

"As of right now, we're basically going to shut down," said Capt. Andrew Green, Commander of the Northern Kansas Army Recruiting Company.

Green said his recruiters would not be able to make long-distance phone calls and operation of all electrical equipment will stop. Green said his company might not even be able to go into the office and turn on the lights.

"We've discussed taking records home and making calls," Green said.

All civilians employed by the military will be put on temporary furlough.

"From everything we've heard, we'll probably be on line again in a couple of days," he said.

The government had a shutdown in 1990, but it shut down during a three-day weekend.

"It'll be interesting," he said. "Nobody has ever experienced this before."

The Army recruiters keep 200 stamps on hand, so they will be able to do recruit mailings, Green said. However, they will not be able to use any special mail services.

"We'll have to park our government cars that we use for recruiting," he said. "We will have to focus on areas we can walk to."

Environmental and safety inspections have also been suspended.

Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., has vowed to return his salary during the shutdown.

"Congress should be treated like all furloughed government employees are treated during a partial government shutdown," Brownback said in a press release late Monday.

"I cannot accept my Congressional pay with a clear conscience while federal workers in the Second District are furloughed," he said.

INTERSESSION

Although K-State assists almost 70 percent of its students for a total of $60 million each academic year, he said more people should look into applying for financial aid.

"I highly encourage every student to apply at least once to find out where they stand," Moeder said. "It would be terrible if students waited too long."

Students should apply as early in their academic career as possible.

Although waiting until you're a junior or senior is better than nothing, it's definitely more advantageous to apply right away and start receiving those federal dollars.

Moeder said it is imperative for students to contact their congressional representatives to let them know what students really need from the financial-aid system.

"We need more grants and less loans," Moeder said. "We've seen some sad financial situations that students are in because there simply isn't enough financial aid."

Moeder said it was a shame to see students with high debts, having a difficult time paying them off once they've graduated. He said it didn't have to be that way.

counts of contempt of court and sentenced to four years in prison, according to "The Trial of Bobby Seale" by Julian Bond, Norman Dorsen and Charles Rembar.

Seale only served a few months in prison. His conviction was overturned on a technicality, said Fred Watson, professor of African American history and ethnic studies.

Seale wrote part of his autobiography, "Seize the Time," while in prison.

Seale stepped down from his position as chairman of the party in 1974. Since then, he has written several books and is studying political science and African American history at Temple University.

Jones said Seale did not fit the typical picture of a leader.

"He was one of those people who didn't fit the mold," Jones said. Seale did not come from a privileged background and had not finished college at the time he assumed his leadership role with the Panther Party.

Besides the fact that Seale is a leader, Jones said, bringing in Seale breaks stereotypes still ingrained in people's minds.

"To be leaders, you don't have to be white and male," Jones said.

It cost $3,000 to bring Seale to speak at K-State. UPC and Blue Key National Honor Fraternity are co-sponsoring the event.

The lecture is free and open to the public.

VILLERY

"I'm a country boy," Villery said. "The longer you stay here, it takes hold of you."

Villery said he wishes Manhattan would take better notice of his band's talent.

"I do love Manhattan, and I wish they would consider me more," Villery said. "The people from out of town look at me as more of a star than they do here."

Six friends he sees nearly every weekend night are his Kansas City bandmates, who together compose the Hurricane Blues and Jazz Band, he said.

"Our repertoire is so high, and we're all over 40, so we don't have to do much rehearsing," Villery said.

Villery said he knows more than 950 songs and his specialty is zydeco and blues.

"I was crowned the king (of harmonica) in Australia and Canada," Villery said. "I play with some of the best there are."

Inspiration is likely to come after playing with legendary artists like Muddy Waters, but Villery's music is like nobody else's.

Among his better-known songs are "Bad Bad Whiskey," "Back Woods Blues," "Fanny Mae's Fish Fry," "Chicken Shit Lover," "New Juke" and "All Night Long."

He produces and arranges all of his own music with Hurricane Productions, his own company he built ten years ago. He said he can't even count the number of songs or records he's come out with over the years.

"My music is different from anyone else's," Villery said. "My harmonica is more or less the organ style."

Villery said his music is inspired by the past and today.

"It's part of my life and the way I live. A lot of it is real, and it means something," Villery said.

ROBERTS

"I think I have a pretty good idea what she's going to do, and I think you do, as well," Roberts told reporters. "I think her decision is independent of what I might do, or might not do."

Kassebaum issued a short statement Monday praising Roberts for deciding to see the 1996 farm bill through but said nothing about her own plans.

"He has provided excellent leadership and will continue to do so in order to fulfill his enormous responsibilities as chairman of the House Agriculture Committee," she said.

Roberts also said there was no deal involving Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., the Republican front-runner for the 1996 presidential nomination. If Dole wins, Gov. Bill Graves could appoint Roberts to the seat. If Dole loses, he might not seek re-election in 1998, and Roberts could run.

But Roberts, 59, said he was not foreclosing a potential Senate campaign in the future.

LECTURE

"The whole world today eats Native American food."

If you walked through the grocery store, you would find Native American contributions of potatoes, corn, peanuts, chocolate, squash, beans and pineapple, he said.

Many different types of crops grown by Native Americans were eventually taken into cultures around the world, although often reluctantly. These foods were so significant they caused changes that later affected world history, Weatherford said.

"Changes in the diet changed the health and culture of people and changed the history of the world," he said. "I often say Russia would have never become a national power if it wasn't for Native Americans."

The Native American contributions to medicine also caused a different pattern in world history, he said.

Native Americans knew vitamin C would cure scurvy and introduced it to Europeans. It is also a legend that Native American tribes used a bark from a tree to help treat Malaria, he said.

"Native knowledge slowly began trickling into Europe," he said.

Native Americans also helped form the culture of the United States. They had a great influence on the English language through words such as shark, hurricane, blizzard and caucus, Weatherford said.

"Indians added words to the English language and gave it a new flexibility by giving it new context," he said.

Early settlers also learned a great deal from the political aspects of Native American tribes. The settlers did not know a lot about democracy nor the concept of separation of powers, he said.

A big problem with these great contributions was that people around the world began to abuse them, Weatherford said.

The Native Americans grew the coca plant to give workers more energy, but when the Europeans found this they fiddled around with it and discovered cocaine. Weatherford said at first this was a great discovery, because it was used as a wonderful pain killer, but people quickly started to abuse it.

"This was a gift from the earth that Native people gave to the world, and the country chose to abuse it," he said.

Vodka was also made from the excess potato crops, he said.

"Alcoholism and drugs parallel with industrialization," he said.

Elaine Schroeter, Topeka resident, said Weatherford made many interesting points in his speech.

"I've read his books and learned a lot in the books that I didn't know. He gave a true perspective of history way back," Schroeter said. "I worry though about the audiences' perceptions, that people will think about Indians only through their contributions."

Amy Sisko, senior in anthropology and American ethnic studies, said she thought the speech was good for people who did not know about the extent of contributions by Native Americans.

"It was really interesting. I've read his book, but before I read the book, I didn't know much about it either," she said.

Weatherford said he has hope the American people are shifting toward a better understanding of Native Americans.

"I do think that there is a Native American Renaissance going on," he said.

There is European, Asian, African and Native American in all of us, Weatherford said. If we are to survive, we must understand that we are a combination of all of these people.

FINE ARTS SPRING ALLOCATIONS REQUESTS

It is time for groups to submit applications for funding of events or projects for which you would like assistance from the Fine Arts Council. As you may or may not know, the Fine Arts Council was created by the Student Senate to establish more fine arts programming on campus. This money is generated from the Fine Arts privilege fee students pay each semester. A reserves account is created that assists in the programming efforts of student groups promoting fine-arts related programming.

The forms that need to be filled out are available at the OSAS Office. THE DEADLINE FOR APPLICATION IS ON OR BEFORE TUESDAY NOVEMBER 21, 1995 AT NOON (12 p.m.).

For more information, please call or go to the Office of Student Activities and Services.

HOLIDAY TV DINNERS

Frozen turkey dinners, chicken pot pies and other frozen dinners are a cheap, simple alternative to Thanksgiving meals. They're not as cheap and simple as going home, but for some who can't make it, it's the only alternative.

FACULTY SENATE

General-education proposal passes

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

Faculty Senate passed a general-education proposal by three votes after a heated debate Tuesday night.

The measure, which needed a two-thirds majority vote, passed in a roll call vote, 47-17-2, after the urging of David Balk, chairman of the General Education Implementation Task Force.

"Either vote this in or put us out of business," Balk said. "We can't be toying around with another debate. We've heard the issues. We know that there are some people who don't support this, but I haven't heard any new issues. And Student Senate, by the way, has endorsed this. I move that the 10-point timetable be adopted."

The proposal, which was tabled during the October Senate meeting, would require incoming freshmen in fall 1997 to take 18 hours of general-education courses.

The program would be evaluated in fall 2001.

The proposal is an effort to train K-State students to think more critically and analytically, improve communication and problem-solving skills.

The classes would emphasize active learning and group activities and would foster connections to other areas of thought.

It was developed upon the recommendation of the Kansas Board of Regents after the North Central Accreditation Team cited K-State for an inadequate general-education curriculum.

Balk spoke in defense of the pro-

CITY COMMISSION

Commissioners seek change in city quorum

Four members needed for business actions at meetings

Cori Cornellison
staff reporter

City commissioners discussed what it would take to pass an ordinance that would change the commission's quorum to do business from three to four.

According to the Kansas Open Meetings Act, a majority of a quorum can't meet in private to discuss city business without having an open meeting.

A quorum is the minimum number of people needed for the commission to do business.

Changing the number of people required for a quorum would allow two members of the five-member commission to meet without calling a public meeting.

It would also require four commissioners to be present at meetings to take action.

Four votes would be needed to pass the charter ordinance or first reading.

If the charter ordinance was passed, there would be a 61-day waiting period before city commissioners could vote on the ordinary ordinance or second reading.

In the 61-day waiting period, the city would be required to have two public hearings in which the public could file an opposition petition and force the issue to go to a city-wide vote.

City Attorney William Frost said he was unsure how many residents' votes it would take to reverse the commission's vote.

If no one objected, the commission would vote on the ordinary ordinance or second readings. Three commissioners would have to vote in favor of the ordinance for it to pass.

If the commission didn't vote before the expiration date of the ordinance, then the quorum would automatically go back to three.

The proposal is for the ordinance to expire in March.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said changing the quorum will be an election issue.

"It will be an issue for elections because it will be asked," he said.

Commissioner Sydney Carlin said the commission could set a date to vote on the charter ordinance prior to reelection and time it so the ordinary ordinance could be voted on by the new commission.

Commissioner Steve Hall said commissioners shouldn't decide their vote on the possibility of it becoming a campaign issue.

"I think we're missing the point here," he said.

"I'd like to leave the politics out," Hall said. "I'm not a political city commissioner. I vote my conscience."

The commission took no action on this issue Tuesday. The charter ordinance will be on the general agenda at the city commission's first meeting in December.

In other business, commissioners discussed proposed revisions of a city ordinance that deals with flashing signs, banners, Planned Unit Development procedures and flood plain regulations.

DOCUMENTARY

'Hoop Dreams' makes TV debut, updates lives

Kimberly Hefling
staff reporter

Ever wondered what happened to William Gates and Arthur Agee after "Hoop Dreams"?

Tonight's the night to find out.

The film, originally made for PBS, will make its television debut at 7 tonight on PBS on channel 11.

In addition, a 30-minute update with the film's main characters and filmmakers will follow the end of the program.

"Hoop Dreams" is a three-hour documentary spanning the high-school basketball years of Gates and Agee in inner-city Chicago. The film demonstrates obstacles such as poverty, gang infestation, drug abuse and violence both must face in their everyday lives to make it through their teenage years.

For more than five years, the filmmakers, Steve James, Frederick Marx and Peter Gilbert, obtained 250 hours of film reflecting the personal lives and basketball careers of Gates and Agee.

"Hoop Dreams" is a glimpse of the interviews and footage taken at birthday parties, basketball courts and the graduation ceremonies.

Gates said in a press release that the film had altered his life in many ways.

"I think we've been under a microscope from the standpoint of getting reviewed by critics," Gates said. "But, overall, it's been an incredible experience — one good thing after another.

"I mean, people are actually sitting at the games, waiting to talk to me about what I'm going to do next. It's been a great opportunity."

Agee said he agreed.

"A lot of people only see me as a movie star, instead of a real person. Everywhere I go, people ask me questions about the film," Agee said. "However, I still live in my same neighborhood, go to the corner store and hang around the same friends."

But Gates and Agee said there were some aspects of their lives the film missed.

Agee said the film did not depict the camaraderie the two men shared.

"We grew up together, we knew each other from the neighborhood — even before the film project began,"

Agee said. "When we were in grammar school, we used to play against each other all the time, and we were still friends after I left St. Joe's."

Gates said he wished the film had shown how close he and his brother really were.

"Well, my brother Curtis. I mean, we've always had a strong relationship," Gates said. "But in the film, he looked like a villain — always criticizing his little brother because he wasn't doing well."

"In reality, there were times when I felt he was the only person in my corner."

Gates said there should have been more scenes with his brother saying supportive and positive things, like the scene in which he was going away to college.

Faculty and students gather after a small memorial service for Yitzhak Rabin, former prime minister of Israel, Tuesday afternoon on the main floor of the K-State Student Union.

Students pay tribute to slain Israeli leader

J. Scot
staff writer

"As people of God, let us pray in peace, for peace. ... For all who have been wounded by the tragic death of Yitzhak Rabin, for all who mourn the death of a peacemaker. For his family, for the people of Israel, for the Jewish community in all places, for each individual grieving over hatred, anger, separation and violence. We pray, O God, for the world community, for we all have been harmed. Bring us comfort, strength and faith undaunted." — part of a prayer read at the memorial service, directed to all people and religions.

About 30 students and faculty gathered in the K-State Student Union to remember and honor Yitzhak Rabin, former prime minister of Israel, at a memorial service Tuesday afternoon.

Prayers were read in Hebrew and then translated into English.

Maytal Shek, senior in pre-art therapy, painted a picture to remember Rabin and what he been through and accomplished in his life.

"I did this to get through and deal with my feelings," she said.

The complete message is the sadness of this, the sadness that brought the leaders from around the world to come to Israel, she said.

"It is sad that it took something like this to bring them together for the first time here in Israel," she said.

Shek said she was trying to find a place to display her work so all students and faculty can see it, but she hasn't found such a place.

Amir Vadash, a student at the American Institute of Baking who served in the Israeli

Army and had met Rabin, said he could not believe one man could take a gun and shoot Rabin.

Rabin achieved something no other man or prime minister had achieved, Vadash said, by making peace and still preserving Israeli security.

Although it was a brief encounter, Vadash said when he met Rabin, it was important to him to tell Rabin he supported him.

Rabin can still lead us through a peace process, he said.

Vadash said he just hoped Shimon Peres, the acting prime minister, can still continue the peace process.

Others who attended were people who had learned something from Rabin assassination.

"As an American, it made me stop and think. I need to rethink my words so that I do not cause someone to act rash," said Rosemary Visser, a secretary with the Department of Industrial and Manufacturing Systems Engineering.

People need to commit themselves to peace, said Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities with the Dean of Student Life Office.

"Not only internationally," he said. "But also here at K-State."

GOVERNMENT

Budget debates rage during governmental shutdown

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With the Smithsonian's splendid museums shuttered and federal workers sent home in droves, the Clinton administration and Republican leaders failed to reach accord on the budget Tuesday and sharply attacked each other over a partial government shutdown.

"At this time, I have to tell you we are at an impasse," said White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta after several hours of talks with GOP leaders ended without agreement.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., said there were no immediate plans to reconvene the talks, although he said staff contacts would continue.

Barring a last-minute concession by either side, that meant the partial government shutdown would roll into its second day today.

And with the government's routine borrowing authority expired as well, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said he would take unspecified steps to avert the default that will otherwise take place.

The failure to reach agreement came after two separate negotiating sessions, sandwiched around unusually strong attacks, both from President Clinton and the Republican leadership.

"Let's say, 'Yes,' to balancing the budget, but let us together say, 'No,' to these deep and unwise cuts in education, technology, the environment, Medicare and Medicaid," Clinton said in a strenuous assault on the GOP budget priorities.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich quickly retaliated, saying Clinton was accusing the GOP of phony cuts that do not exist. He said the president's own balanced-budget proposal would perpetuate deficits forever, and he challenged Clinton to help negotiate a seven-year plan to erase deficits without baloney.

Senior White House aides met at midday with key lawmakers, the two sides arranging themselves around a green, felt-covered table in one of the Senate's committee meeting rooms. They reconvened a few hours later in the Capitol, but on emerging, they described a day of futile discussions.

The first effects of the shutdown were being felt, although essential services such as the nation's defense, air traffic control system and prison operations were maintained without interruption.

'HOOP DREAMS'

'Hoop Dreams' will make its television debut at 7 tonight on PBS, channel 11.

The update following the show includes footage taken four years after filming of "Hoop Dreams" was completed.

Today, Gates and Agee both have two children.

Gates is a senior at Marquette University in Milwaukee. He is majoring in communications and plans to pursue a career in marketing, public relations or broadcasting.

At Marquette, Gates played on the basketball team for three years, including the 1994-95 NIT championship team.

Agee attended Mineral Area Junior College for two years and is a student at Arkansas State University with a basketball scholarship.

Although he is pursuing a degree in radio and television, Agee said he still hoped to continue his basketball career in the NBA or the Continental Basketball Association.

"As long as I'm living and I know to myself that I can play this game, I will keep knocking at the door," Agee said.

At its premiere at the 1994 Sundance Film Festival, the film won the Audience Award for Best Documentary.

The film then went into theatrical release and won every renowned critic award for Best Documentary of 1994, including the New York Film Critics Circle, the Los Angeles Film Critics and the National Society of Film Critics.

In addition, "Hoop Dreams" was named Best Picture of the Year by the Los Angeles Times, Washington Post and the Chicago Film Critics Association.

In the news

HOLIDAY SHOPPING SEASON OFF TO SHAKY START; SALES DECREASE

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a disappointing kickoff to the holiday shopping season, sales at department stores and clothing outlets sagged in October, pulling overall retail sales down. Despite the sluggish spending by debt-heavy consumers, analysts said the overall economy is healthy. They predicted the Federal Reserve would not trim interest rates when it meets Wednesday in the midst of a governmental budget stalemate.

Just before closing its data-collection agencies in a government shutdown caused by that impasse, the Commerce Department said Tuesday that retail sales fell 0.2 percent in October, the first decline in three months. Sales rose a scant 0.1 percent in September, less than an earlier estimate of up 0.3 percent.

"Fourth-quarter consumer spending will be weak and Christmas sales are likely to disappoint retailers," economist Cheryl Katz of Merrill Lynch & Co., said. "All measures of consumer indebtedness are at or near record highs and, even more important, job and income growth are slowing."

Although consumer spending accounts for two-thirds of the nation's economic activity, analysts said the economy is strong enough to expand without a rate-cut boost from the Federal Reserve.

STATE SPENDING POWER GROWS

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — Kansas agencies will need to sharpen their management skills as the federal government transfers more responsibility to the states through block grants, a top state official said. Teresa Markowitz, commissioner for children and families, told legislators the block grant proposal means federal money will flow to the states with fewer restrictions on how states can spend it.

A block grant means the federal government will provide money to the states for certain services, such as welfare, and states will decide how to spend it. It also means less federal money will be earmarked for specific programs.

"We believe, with near certainty, we will have fewer federal dollars and probably fewer strings attached to those dollars," Markowitz told the Joint Committee on

Children and Families. "We have to ultimately have better managers," she said.

Presently, welfare reform measures in Congress would impose a five-year lifetime limit on assistance and would deny federal benefits to people who are not citizens and to teen parents under 18.

The congressional proposal also would not allow a welfare mother to receive additional benefits if she has another baby while on assistance. Markowitz said the state has taken some steps to prepare for funding reductions.

In addition to cuts in federal funding, Gov. Bill Graves has asked the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services and other state agencies to reduce their budgets by 1.5 percent, and to reduce the number of full time employees by 2 percent.

X-RAYS TO DETERMINE MALE'S FATE

NEW YORK (AP) — A murder defendant claims he's too young to face the death penalty.

Federal prosecutors want to X-ray his bones to see for themselves.

Fu Xin Chen — a reputed gang member charged with conspiring to kidnap, torture and murder a Chinese garment worker — says he's only 15. Authorities believe Chen is 23.

Chen's age could mean his life: Adults age 18 and older can be sentenced to death in federal court for a kidnapping that ends in a killing. Juveniles cannot.

Prosecutors argued during a closed hearing last week that X-rays would show whether Chen's bones are those of an adult, according to defense attorneys and a law enforcement source.

Chen's lawyer, Richard Levitt, said that X-raying his client would constitute an invasive search and that a court order was needed.

Prosecutors haven't decided what sentence to pursue, but prosecutor Valerie Caproni told the judge it would be prudent to appoint a death-penalty lawyer for each of the defendants.

Caproni wouldn't comment specifically on Chen but said using X-rays and other medical means to settle age disputes isn't unprecedented.

X-rays also have been used on bodies to determine the age at death.

If the exam is ordered, a radiologist probably would X-ray Chen's upper arms, said James Taylor, a professor of forensic anthropology at Lehman College in the Bronx.

If he is 19 or older, cartilage growth plates at the shoulders will have fused into bone, Taylor said.

Toby Rush, junior in mechanical engineering, falls into the arms of a group of Blue Key and Army ROTC members Tuesday afternoon as a part of Mission Possible sponsored by Blue Key for leadership week.

Motivation distinguishes achiever

Phil Roberts
staff reporter

When excellence in leadership and authority come to mind, the path leads straight to Chris Hansen, junior in nuclear engineering.

Hansen was one of five students selected by Blue Key as an excellent leader on K-State's campus during Blue Key's Leadership Week.

"Chris' ability to motivate others and keep the adrenaline flowing is definitely an attribute that sets him apart as a leader,"

Toby Rush, junior in mechanical engineering, said. "Not only is he able to motivate himself and others, but he is willing to put in the time and effort to make a project successful."

Hansen

As a fraternity brother and friend, Rush nominated Hansen to be recognized as one of the top leaders on campus.

"I've worked with him extensively," Rush said. "I nominated him because of his drive and the quality of his work."

New students inspire leader

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Dale Pracht, senior in agriculture education, finds little stress in juggling his many leadership responsibilities.

A constant smile, a sincere laugh and a pocket full of off-the-wall "Dale-isms," keeps everything in perspective.

"I think it's important to listen to concerns, add a joke or find a unique way to motivate others into using their own talents," Pracht said. "I don't want to get too far away from tradition, but instead of doing it the same way each year, I've found that finding a new avenue sparks interests and gets more people involved."

As alumni chair for Farmhouse, Pracht found a magician folk singer to entertain the alumni visitors during a well-attended Homecoming event.

"I always look for something a little different, something that will be fun," Pracht said.

As vice president of KSU Student Foundation, Pracht helps organize for fund-raising events. He also serves as an ag ambassador and is the president and a team member of the National Agri-Marketing Association.

By sacrificing television and time for himself during the week, Pracht said he has an opportunity to work closely with other students.

"I like working with the younger students. They are an inspiration. It's important to find things about people that you admire, their strengths and see how to improve on my own," Pracht said.

Pracht

Pracht has worked as a career specialist at the Academic and Career Information Center since his sophomore year. He also serves as an Ag Council representative for Collegiate FFA and as a reporter for the Ag Education Club.

"The more you do, the more you can accomplish. It's like they say — an object in motion stays in motion while an object at rest tends to stay at rest. I find that the more I do, the more I have time to do," Pracht said.

Pracht attributes his strong work ethic to decision-making, management and technical skills he gained on his family's livestock and crop farm.

"The one thing you learn early on is a hard work ethic," Pracht said. "Farmers put a lot of time in. In all the time I worked on a farm, I never got paid by the hour. The work was there, it needed to be done, and someone had to do it."

Internet access is a source for student projects

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

As students become familiar with using the Internet and the resources available there, more are using that information for sources in writing research papers and speeches.

Sites such as the Library of Congress and the Smithsonian Institute home pages provide starting points for general research, but there are many other sites available.

Which ones are reliable and how to cite them as sources are two of the questions brought up by the increasing use of research on the Internet.

Irene Ward, director of the expository writing program, said students at all levels in the English department are using the Internet.

Students need to be careful to document the Internet site, which should be one the instructor can access, and the credibility of who is doing the posting if they are going to use the Internet as a resource in their papers, she said.

"Certain pages are going to have more credibility than others, and that needs to be taken into account," she said.

Ward said the 14th edition of the "Chicago Manual of Style" and the fourth edition of the "MLA Style Manual" contain standards for citing information obtained from the Internet.

Nancy Goulden, director of public speaking, said whether students can use the Internet as a resource for speeches was up to the individual instructor.

"The next edition of the public speaking text will have a section on using the Internet," she said.

Mark Parillo, associate professor of history, said students often didn't know how to cite their Internet sources.

Be Part of the Magic that will...

While hunger exists year-round, the need for food assistance is most intense in November and December because it is compounded by other holiday needs. Help meet the goals of the Mayor's Holiday Tree this year.

KSU Operation Turkey "Now in Progress"

Operation Turkey is a philanthropic event sponsored by the KSU Order of Omega Chapter and KSU Greek community. Now through Thursday, collections in the community will begin. The weigh-in for collected cans of food will be Friday from 4 to 7 p.m. at the Breadbasket, 905 Yuma St.

Christian holidays capture campus spotlight

Despite many cries to diversify certain aspects of society, areas of contemporary life have managed to slip by even the most watchful, politically correct eye.

There has been local, campus-oriented concern about the upcoming holiday season, especially the way it is celebrated.

The problem has to do with the neglect of many global holidays while the traditional, Eurocentric, Christian occasions continue to dominate campus life.

Our campus is made up of a diverse people, although it might not seem so at a casual glance. Many of the faces we see on a daily basis are of the same European American ethnic heritage.

We must not forget the many different national faces beside us in the K-State Student Union and in class, as well as the beliefs they carry with them through everyday life.

Our campus is decorated every year with the symbols of Christmas. These decorations are provided by the University.

Therefore, they are provided by state funds. Every student's tuition plays a small part in bringing the trees, wreaths and lights to campus.

The question is this: How many times during the past years have Jewish symbols of faith been hung on the outside gates of K-State facing Aggieville? Are the icons of the Islamic faith displayed in a prominent place in the Union?

Many students could not even identify a symbol of Kwanza, much less be able to explain the holiday to friends. The knowledge of faiths like Buddhism is left to the high-school social studies texts no one remembers reading.

If students pay tuition at a university, they deserve to have their holidays celebrated. This is not a bleeding-heart attitude, nor does it have anything to do with a neo-pagan movement. I state it in the interest of fairness.

A common argument runs along the simple lines of money. If a majority of people pay a majority of the money, shouldn't their holiday be celebrated on a wider basis than that of a minority? When people follow such a train of thought, they send a message of dismissal to a culture, saying that another's belief isn't as important as their own.

This has been especially true on our own campus in light of recent messages of hate found posted on bulletin boards. We owe tolerance toward different cultures simply out of respect for other human beings.

A certain amount of the University's money should be spent toward various groups' celebrations. The rest of the money, however much the individual group wishes to spend, can be made up out of private pockets.

Of course, there are obvious judgment calls to make about whether a group constitutes enough of a presence on campus to have money donated toward its organization's celebrations. A panel made up of faculty and students from diverse backgrounds would be an excellent forum for designating the importance of such matters.

I know this subject gives rise to a factional, indignant group of people from the mainstream.

The message I have for those individuals is simple. The very emotions and concerns you now possess are what have run through minorities for countless years in this country. Their ideals, though, have gone beyond being threatened — they have been completely ignored.

Our tolerance rises with our education. The views of the mainstream will not collapse if a diverse culture becomes prevalent.

Rather, they will stand together, adopting different ideologies while becoming stronger. Humanity didn't evolve to the point we're at now by not listening to one another. We evolved by the integration, not separation, of culture.

▶ LACKING PUREBRED SWINE

Editor,

A serious deficiency exists at K-State's Department of Agriculture. The swine unit at K-State has eliminated purebred hog production from the unit's herd.

Currently, there are only company hogs in production at K-State, eliminating any hands-on experience in the purebred swine industry. K-State is one of the few four-year agricultural colleges that does not maintain a purebred herd in its swine unit.

All other animal science units (sheep, cattle, horse and dairy) at K-State maintain purebred herds in their operations.

It is the responsibility of a college to maintain purebred genetics in its unit.

It is important the University be visible in the purebred sector of the state's swine industry. Producers in the state look to the University as a seedstock source to improve the quality of their herds.

Producers look to agricultural colleges to answer their questions about purebred genetics, such as expected progeny differences.

It is the responsibility of the college to teach the purebred aspect of the hog industry to its students. Knowledge of each breed and its contribution to the swine industry is important.

A breeder must know what breeds to use for various conditions. The college should be providing its students with all aspects of the swine industry, not just those associated with company hogs.

Having a purebred herd in the swine unit could also serve as a valuable recruiting tool for the college. It will establish a more positive image for the University around the nation. Those individuals involved in establishing the criteria for the swine unit should re-evaluate their position and reinstate a purebred herd at K-State's swine unit.

▶ BUTT OUT AND GIVE IT UP!

Editor,

Next to Thanksgiving, Nov. 16 is one of the most famous Thursdays. It's the American Cancer Society's Great American Smokeout.

The Tobacco Free Coalition invites you to take part and quit smoking for 24 hours or lend a helping hand to someone who is trying to quit.

Just because you're smokeless doesn't mean you can't take part in the great American Smokeout. Dippers and chewers are also encouraged to participate. Plane crashes and other disasters shock and draw the attention of the entire world when they involve people in large numbers killed in a catastrophic incident.

Yet, not enough attention is directed to the 1,400 Americans who die each day from using tobacco products.

Because data indicates that most smokers begin smoking before the age of 18, it's especially important to prevent youth access to tobacco products.

According to the World Health Organization, smoking currently kills about 3 million people a year.

Following are some statistics provided by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment regarding tobacco use in Kansas and nationwide:

■ Tobacco use is the No. 1 preventable cause of premature death and disability in Kansas.

■ Tobacco kills more Kansans each year than alcohol, cocaine, crack, heroin, homicide, suicide, car accidents, fire and AIDS combined.

■ Smoking accounts for 90 percent of lung cancer deaths and is the principal cause of coronary heart disease and emphysema.

■ More than one out of five adults use tobacco.

■ Almost four out of 10 Kansas youth report smoking cigarettes in the past 30 days. One out of four have tried smoking before the age of 12.

■ At least 3.1 million adolescents are current smokers. In Kansas, an estimated 11,000 young people start smoking each year.

■ Cigarette smoking costs the Kansas economy $594 million each year in health care and lost productivity costs. This translates to $2.68 for each pack of cigarettes purchased in Kansas.

The American Cancer Society and Center for Disease Control and Prevention reports that within 20 minutes of smoking that last cigarette, the body begins a series of changes that lasts for years.

After just 20 minutes —
■ Blood pressure drops to normal.

■ Body temperature of hands and feet increase to normal.

After 24 hours —
■ Nerve endings start to grow again.

■ Ability to smell and taste is enhanced.

The American Cancer Society would like to express its appreciation to the public and the private agencies that have gone smoke-free and promote a healthful environment for all.

Playing the dating game in

THE PERSONAL ADS

I did something I have never done before Monday night. I wrote a personal ad.

No, it's not for me. It's for my friend, Alex, who decided he had not tried everything until he placed a personal ad with Pitch Weekly.

Before you get the wrong idea, Alex is a nice guy, one of my favorite people, as a matter of fact. There's nothing wrong with him; he just doesn't date much. Alex is shy, but like most shy people, he's a lot of fun once he opens up.

His dating life is not what he wants it to be, so Monday night we entered the wild and weird world of personal ads.

People place these things for a variety of reasons. We did it because Alex is tired of trying to make small talk before class and he's not much for the bar scene. Besides, who wants to meet someone new when they're dead drunk?

If you've never read the personal section of Pitch Weekly, I recommend you do so. Many interesting and amusing people advertise there. Whatever you're into, I guarantee you will find someone who is into it, too.

The Pitch Singles is pretty entertaining. There's also a section called Diversions, which you probably shouldn't read if you have strong moral convictions or believe sex should be practiced with only two people and no one else.

The Pitch can be found at various points around Aggieville, and it's free. It's not a bad magazine. Based in Kansas City, it covers Kansas City, Lawrence and sometimes Topeka and Manhattan. I like the News of the Weird column, and the horoscopes are usually flaky.

But I digress.

Monday night, Alex decided it was time for him to try the personal ad route with the help of a professional. So he bought me dinner to pay for my services, and we described Alex in 40 words or less.

Doing this is not easy. There is definitely an art behind it.

We weighed every syllable and considered the various meanings of each phrase. We considered what sort of person would answer an ad that mentioned role-playing games and vampires (no one Alex wanted to meet).

Alex was forced to take a long, hard look at himself. Does he want to date someone with kids? Smokers and/or drinkers? Someone who has a dog, cat or lizard? How old or young?

About halfway through this process, Alex decided he was rather shallow and probably wouldn't date himself.

Alex decided he needed to find someone who didn't smoke because he has asthma. No kids, either, so he wouldn't have to deal with anyone less mature than himself. Pets were fine, but he prefers cats to dogs.

He wanted no one older than 30, because he's only 24 and thought it would look weird (his words, not mine).

We also used "inexperienced" instead of a bunch of words that could have been more embarrassing.

After two hours of drinking White Russians and going through a lot of my notebook paper, we came up with what I feel is a pretty decent ad.

It's a little weird, makes some arcane references to Greek mythology and mentions Alex being user friendly. I hope this thing helps him get what he wants. If not, at least we had a fun evening and I got a free dinner.

I've decided that if he gets any kind of positive response, I'll stick that ad in my résumé.

Student leaders need a reality check

I am a horrible student leader. In fact, I'm the worst kind because most of the time, I tend to believe I am a leader.

I have a considerable amount of power, know many key students and administrators and have a prestigious position on campus. But these factors have falsely led me to believe that I am a student leader.

I look like one, I certainly talk like one, and I might believe I am one, but I promise you I am nowhere close to being a leader.

All of you who call yourselves leaders give leadership a bad name because we all are managers going through the motions of leadership.

Think about it: Are there really students who are concerned with the quality of life at K-State in years to come and who have dedicated themselves to the leadership that will guarantee the development of ourselves and our institution?

I can only think of three or four students who meet the true definition of what a leader is.

For the most part, we run meetings and type agendas. We spend a significant amount of our time dealing with organizational, budget and finance issues that won't matter in a year.

We do more fighting over internal body issues in our organizational meetings than goal setting as teams and groups.

We say we have the vision and the drive to inspire change for the future of K-State, but we have merely dedicated ourselves to the monotonous daily tasks of "leadership" that keep our organizations breathing.

There are incredible differences between leaders and managers. Our power as student leaders should come from our vision and our values, as well as our ability to create meaning for people as the influence others.

Power is not in a position or the amount of control you hold on campus or in your organization, but this is how we act as student managers.

If we truly desire to be leaders, we must move past budgets, insignificant details and agendas. We don't have the luxury to spend hours on an impeachment process or who should not have received money in an allocations process.

As leaders, it is imperative to find the drive to make a difference in the grand scheme of things. Although we must have management skills to be effective leaders, we cannot let that be our only vision and inspiration.

We will always have managerial tasks to complete and forge through, and I am not advocating that you forget about daily maintenance or dismiss all tasks for bigger issues.

What I am suggesting is that everyone who has ever taken the luxury of calling themselves a leader should take a minute and reflect about what they have truly contributed and will contribute during their time here. Strive to create long-lasting vision and far-reaching impact.

Continually develop your skills as a leader and your ability to balance your managerial role as a leader.

Just because I don't think I am a true leader yet doesn't mean I don't yearn to be one. I recognize leadership is something all of us must continually strive to achieve, and even then we may never achieve our goal.

I have learned leadership is not gift, talent, sheer charisma or a position. I hope you can find the ability to create vision in yourself and others that will lead you to the same conclusion.

K-State will become a better place once we all learn that lesson.

LEADERSHIP

Government lacks compassion

Power is not the vital role for today's leaders

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

Defining leadership is not an easy task.

"Most things we hear about leadership are bullshit," said Terry Johnson, director of the Center for Basic Cancer Research, in a presentation Tuesday night at K-State Student Union Little Theatre.

Leadership is not defined by power or influence, but by something much deeper, he said.

The most important attribute in a leader is compassion, and not power, he said.

Compassion is missing in the leadership of the government at a national level and in society, he said.

"It makes me angry. It makes me damn angry," he said.

Unfortunately, Johnson said he does not know what to do about the lack of compassion.

Very often leaders are not at the top of the pyramid, he said.

"The real leaders are the ones in middle management doing their job. They don't get the recognition that the powerful do."

Power has the ability to corrupt, and corrupt people can be empowered, Johnson said.

However, corruption in leadership does not always exist.

Albert Einstein and Abraham Lincoln showed compassion to other people by helping, Johnson said.

To illustrate this, Johnson told a story of Lincoln writing a letter home for a dying soldier and staying with him until he died.

"It's an inspiration to me to see someone in power not forget the little people," Susan Seymour, sophomore in political science, said.

Johnson offered an unique perspective on leadership. Paul Friedrichs, senior in agricultural economics, said.

"I liked his viewpoint on compassion in leadership," Friedrichs said.

LEADERSHIP LECTURE

1st impressions open doors

Rebecca Schulz
staff reporter

First impressions have far-reaching effects, a Leadership Week '95 speaker said Tuesday.

"Each time you meet the public, they're making an impression of you," said Linda Reinhardt, chairwoman of American Farm Bureau Women's Committee. "It takes 15 seconds to make the first impression and the rest of your life to undo it if it's negative."

Tim Lehman, freshman in business administration, said he was amazed how quickly individuals form impressions of others.

"The first 15 seconds are important, because you're rejected by it," Lehman said.

Reinhardt presented a list that included items from personal appearance to how individuals carry themselves.

Susan Fignar, a certified image consultant from Chicago, created the list.

The list noted that it was important to be able to walk in a room, find where you are going and proceed there confidently.

Spoken edict is also an important part of impressions. When participating in small talk, it is important not to get too technical, Reinhardt said.

"Remember, when you're in a group, think about what you say to people," Reinhardt said. "Don't tell them what they don't want to hear."

Reinhardt used examples of her travels to the Ukraine and Russia to emphasize her points.

She said that by making a good first impression, she was able to open doors for women in agriculture in these countries.

LEADERSHIP WEEK '95

Society seeks help from educated people

1st hand accounts lend informed views of issues

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

Sitting on top of a fence allows you to get a better view of things and be neutral on issues, but you can not see details as clearly, a speaker for Leadership Week '95 said.

"Fences are not designed to be on top of," said Sharon Morcos, instructor in the Department of Foods and Nutrition.

"You need to climb up on top of the fence to get a vision and then come down to where the other people are," Morcos said.

Morcos presented "Getting Off the Fence and Challenging the Status Quo" to a small group of students Tuesday morning.

"We all have our own fences," Morcos said. "Each one is tailor-made for our own personal growth."

When people get off the fence, they see things they do not want to see, she said.

Morcos has traveled to Mexico twice to work with a group fighting hunger.

While in Mexico, she met a child she said brought the issue of hunger to her on a personal level.

Morcos described holding the little girl and being able to place her hand on the child's abdomen and feel the intestinal worms.

"Hunger got a face that day," Morcos said.

Linda Nordhus, junior in pre-health and business, said many people do not realize how much people suffer until they see it firsthand.

"I was about to cry when I saw the pictures of the children and heard the music," said Nausheen Kazi, sophomore in hotel management and business.

Morcos said society demands leadership from educated people. If people have the opportunity and ability to help but do nothing, they are like weeds, she said.

"I hope you will be inspired to discover your own fence topic, whatever that may be," Morcos said.

"We are all ordinary people, but we all have the ability to do extraordinary things," she said.

'HOOP DREAMS' AIRS TONIGHT

"Hoop Dreams," the award-winning documentary telling the story of two high-school students who dream of playing in the NBA, premieres at 7 tonight on KTWU/Channel 11.

A few rumors of a retirement, a streaker and the origin of one's hair

When a sports-writer says he has inside information, don't question him — just accept it.

The same goes for rumors, and there have been some nasty ones circulating around of late.

The first rumor is that I may be quitting the Collegian to pursue other endeavors but upon further review, I've found I have so many more people to anger out there.

So live with it, K-State, I am here for the long haul.

Numerous rumors, substantiated and unsubstantiated, have also circulated about exactly which bowl game the Wildcats could end up in. Each and every city south of Wichita has been named as a possible destination for the Cats, but don't set your travel plans just yet for Dallas and the Cotton Bowl — the powers that be can always find a way to screw the Cats.

COLUMNS

TODD STEWART

Speaking of bowls, I have inside information to indicate a possible return of "The Great White," the streaker who trekked across campus last fall in protest of the Cats going to the Aloha Bowl. In an exclusive interview with me

Sunday night, "The Great White" said he would be disappointed with anything less than a Cotton Bowl appearance, but he did not want to make another trip across campus if it could be helped.

"I don't want to do it," he said. "But..."

Another interesting rumor, and every bit true, is that basketball season has already begun. From the "In Case You Missed It" file, the Cats won its exhibition opener on Saturday night in front of less than 4,000 and take the court again this Saturday for a battle against traditional national men's basketball powerhouse, Pella Window.

Get your tickets while they are hot. Speaking of hot, quarterback Matt Miller has been on fire of late. And, of course, I have my share of rumors concerning Miller.

My first Miller rumor is that Miller's receiving trio of Kevin Lockett, Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger are making Miller all he is, and without those three he is the fourth-best quarterback in the conference.

Come to think of it, that might not be a rumor at all. But let's assume it is.

But commentary about Miller and his play would not be complete with at least a few words on his ever-popular hair.

And I do have the news tip of the year concerning Miller's hair.

Anonymous sources close to Miller, who asked to be referred as only "The Buffalo" and "The Cole," have said off-the-record that Miller deserves none of the credit for his hair, that in fact, someone else is to credit.

The inspiration behind Miller's hair, "The Buffalo" and "The Cole" said?

Former K-State baseball player and Miller's roommate, Chris Bouchard.

Apparently, as I am told, Miller is not even the prettiest in his household, let alone K-State.

To which I say to Miller — I am disappointed.

I looked up to you, your hair, your greatness, everything. And you cheated me. I was deceived. My hero is not the pretty man I once thought him to be.

So if you'll excuse me, I have got some new styling to do.

Send your K-State football rumors and more to Todd via e-mail at (toddvs@ksu.ksu.edu).

Senior wide receivers Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger came to K-State five years ago as freshmen football players from Iowa. Ever since, the two have been the best of friends, but Saturday's game against Colorado marks the last home game in their decorated careers.

One last hurrah

by Chris May

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

Junior wide receiver Kevin Lockett looks on as senior wide receivers Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger embrace after a Wildcat touchdown in Saturday's victory over Iowa State. Running and Schwieger will take the field Saturday against Colorado for their last games at KSU Stadium.

When senior wide receivers Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger run onto Wagner Field for the last time Saturday, they will be running off just as they ran on five years ago — together.

Running and Schwieger came to K-State five years ago for a visit not knowing for sure if they wanted to be Wildcats. They left Manhattan knowing they would be.

With a good distance of miles between Decorah and Cedar Rapids, Running and Schwieger weren't the best of friends in high school.

"We were pretty good friends," Running said.

"We weren't like buddy-buddy, but we competed in stuff against each other," Schwieger said.

Both Running and Schwieger were standouts in sports other than just football. Running lettered in four sports at Decorah High School. He lettered in football, baseball, basketball and track. Schwieger lettered in football, baseball and basketball.

They never got to play against each other in high school because Running's school was a division below Schwieger's. But they had met through football and basketball camps. They had even talked about maybe going to school together.

"We didn't know for sure, but my coach and his coach both set up a visit, and they figured we could both go together. So I rode down with his parents," Schwieger said.

The visit wasn't the only reason they came to look at K-State.

"We had ties to Iowa," Running said.

"Coach Snyder was from Iowa originally, and my receiver coach at my high school was a receiver under Coach Snyder," Schwieger said.

They said they liked what they saw at K-State.

"We liked it, loved it," Running said.

"We loved it. We came for a Saturday and Sunday visit because we both had a basketball ball game Friday night," Schwieger said. "The visit was a lot of fun. A lot of the players at the time were excited about the turnaround that K-State was making, and they were all really close."

Schwieger said he was impressed by the close-knit group of players.

"That was one of the differences I saw at K-State, from all the other schools, was how close all the players were."

It was then that the two Iowans decided to become Wildcats.

"We decided on the way back that we were going to go to K-State," Schwieger said.

Schwieger was quick to point that out they also enjoyed Manhattan.

"We also liked Manhattan. We went out to Tuttle Creek and looked around the campus," Schwieger said.

Going to K-State was not something the two players had always dreamed of.

"I always wanted to play for the Hawkeyes — that was my first choice," Schwieger said. "I'm 15 miles from Iowa City, and I grew up being around the Hawkeyes."

For Running his favorite team was USC and people were a bit taken back by their decision to become Wildcats.

"A lot of people were like, 'Why are you going there?'" Running said.

"Where is it, and why are you going there?" Everything is Iowa or Iowa State up there, and I think people were mad we weren't going there."

Schwieger said he got the same type of feedback from his friends.

"They didn't want to make fun of you to your face. They didn't just want to come up and say 'What are you going there for?'" Schwieger said.

Schwieger said they didn't know a lot about K-State.

"Even Mitch and I really didn't know about K-State or K-State football and what it was all about before we came here. We knew they were bad, but we didn't know what K-State was," Schwieger said.

However, the two said they had no regrets.

"I think if we would have gone to school at Iowa or Iowa State, we would have gotten lost in the shuffle because we would have been in-state guys," Schwieger said.

"Coming here, it was nice to get away from there, and we kind of made names for ourselves here and helped turn this program around. It was good to come here and help turn K-State around."

"We have no regrets. It's been a dream come true for us," Schwieger said.

K-State focused on No. 9 Colorado

Ryan O'Halloran

staff writer

It's a given that No. 7 K-State will be bowling this holiday season. But the lane in which it does so is still in question as it prepares for its regular-season finale against No. 9 Colorado at 2:30 Saturday afternoon at KSU Stadium.

A win over the Buffs (8-3) would do several things for the Wildcats in determining where they will spend the last week of December.

A victory would put K-State at 10-1, its first 10-win season since 1910, and secure second place for itself in the Big 8 behind No. 1 Nebraska. It would also put it in the driver's seat for the Cotton Bowl Jan. 1 in Dallas against Washington or Oregon.

But the temptation to think about the 10-win season, the second-place finish and going to a New Year's Day bowl hasn't bitten the Cats yet.

"There's a businesslike approach," Coach Bill Snyder said at his weekly press conference. "Everybody understands what's at stake, and I think our guys have handled that fine.

"I think we learned something from the Nebraska game that perhaps helps in this environment, and we learned how not to deal with our emotions and consequently, how to deal with our emotions."

Snyder said K-State's approach to the postseason hasn't been any different this season than last year, when a 9-2 regular season record put the Cats in the Aloha Bowl.

"I don't think there's ever been a different approach," Snyder said. "I believe that some things were either misconstrued or blown out of proportion last year, and there was so much talk that when we went to Hawaii, that we embarrassed Boston College or played down Boston College."

"The only thing that was ever said to my recollection was the fact that we wanted to go to whatever bowl that was the appropriate bowl, and that was designated for whatever place you finished in the Big 8."

Snyder said he didn't pay attention to all the postseason talk that showers the television, radio and newspapers.

"I don't listen to it," he said. "We would like to go to the Cotton Bowl — we would be honored to go anywhere — but it's out of my hands and out of the players' hands."

Going to a New Year's Day bowl would be a big step for K-State, who beat Wyoming two years ago in the Copper Bowl and lost to Boston College in the Aloha Bowl last year. The bowl bid, along with the 10-win plateau, are all accomplishments.

"I know it's a giant step," Snyder said. "Ten wins is better than nine, and these guys have won nine games in each of the past two seasons, but it's not an over stride."

A credit to the 27 wins in the last three seasons are the senior class, 12 of who play regularly.

"I don't think you win nine ball games without good senior class," Snyder said.

K-State controls its own bowl destiny if it wins, but its postseason trip is in the hands of a tie-breaker and a Colorado win.

Volleyball team to face Oral Roberts

Shana Howell

staff writer

It's crunch time for the women's volleyball team as it travels to Tulsa, Okla., for tonight's match against Oral Roberts University.

Although the match has no bearing on K-State's battle with the Colorado Buffaloes for fourth place in the Big 8, it will be a determining factor as far as NCAA tournament hopes go for the Wildcats.

K-State is 19-8 overall and 5-6 in the Big 8. With just two matches to go, the Cats have found themselves in a must-win situation.

They take on the 25-2 Golden Eagles at 7:30 tonight.

The last time the Golden Gophers and the Cats met, the Gophers emerged with the victory in a close 3-2 match.

"This is a huge match," Coach Jim Moore said. With the NCAA tourney on the line, the Cats need to win this match, he said.

"If we win the two this week, it will be almost impossible to keep us out of the tournament," Moore said.

Moore said because Colorado defeated both Ohio State, a top-10 team, and Brigham Young University, a top-15 team, earlier this season, and because Oral Roberts University defeated Oklahoma, it will be tough for the NCAA tournament committee to exclude K-State from the postseason tournament if the Cats defeat Colorado and Oral Roberts.

Although freshman middle blocker Val Wieck will be traveling with the team to Tulsa, she will not see time on the court.

Recovering from an emergency appendectomy undergone last week, Moore said Wieck was still not quite ready to play.

"She's doing a few things to be able to play Saturday against Colorado, but as of right now, all we know is that she is definitely not playing tomorrow night," Moore said.

The loss of Wieck on the squad could possibly make a difference in the match against Oral Roberts University.

Wieck has been hitting .368 on the season, including 162 kills.

Thanksgiving on the Cheap

When you can't go home for Thanksgiving, a turkey TV dinner could be a tasty substitute

Students are eagerly waiting to go home to their families for an annual Thanksgiving feast.

"We've got the works," Kevin Colgan, junior in business administration, said. "The turkey, the mashed potatoes, the fruits and vegetables and, most importantly, the apple pie."

Colgan said he hated to think what he would do without his yearly gorging at the Thanksgiving dinner table.

"It's scary to think what I'd do if I had to stay here for Thanksgiving," he said. "I can't cook, and since I'm in a fraternity, our cook won't be here, so I'd have to come up with something."

The only option Colgan would have left is the inevitable frozen TV dinners.

"If that nightmare of no family dinner came true, I'd probably go out and buy a TV dinner," he said. "They're so easy to make — just pop them in the microwave, and you're done."

"You gotta love 'em."

Colgan said his favorite dinner was the Hungry Man Salisbury steak. But he also said that because Thanksgiving was a special occasion, he might have to go with the turkey dinner.

"I'd love to have some turkey, mashed potatoes and a little carrots if you can get 'em," he said. "I love Hungry Man because their vegetables are always fresh and crisp."

For some, frozen dinners are popular all year. Some consumers seek out supermarket frozen-food sections for the inexpensive, easy-to-make meals.

"We sell lots of frozen-food dinners throughout the year," said Kurt Mactaggart, frozen foods department manager at a local grocery store. "Especially around the holidays, our frozen-food sales pick up a little bit."

"Around the first week before Thanksgiving, our sales increase about 30 percent with the turkey dinners."

Mactaggart, who orders and restocks food in the frozen-food section, said the most popular brand of TV dinner was by far the Banquet brand.

"The bestselling meals are the Banquet fried chicken and turkey and gravy meals," he said. "They are our two bestsellers throughout the year, especially now around the holiday season."

There are many options for the frozen-food shopper.

Options include the size of the meal, cost, content and how much fat is involved.

The most expensive meals are the Swanson Hungry Man meals.

The Hungry Man turkey meal features turkey and gravy with dressing, mashed potatoes and an apple-cranberry dessert.

Many students are unable to cook and find processed meals a quick alternative. For some, the upcoming Thanksgiving holiday is a chance to eat real food again.

The Hungry Man meals are the largest meals in the frozen-food section, but they carry a price tag of around $3 and contain 17 grams of fat.

Conversely on the fat scale, shoppers can purchase the Healthy Choice turkey meal, which only has three grams of fat.

The Healthy Choice turkey meal contains turkey and gravy with dressing, mixed vegetables in butter sauce and an apple-cranberry compote.

Healthy Choice dinners cost between $2 and $3.

As Mactaggart said, the Banquet frozen dinners are the most popular. Banquet brand dinners cost between $1 and $2, and split the difference between Hungry Man and Healthy choice with only 10 grams of fat.

The Banquet turkey dinner features turkey and gravy with dressing, mashed potatoes and corn in seasoned sauce. Surprisingly, the Banquet brand dinner doesn't come with a dessert.

"It really doesn't bother me when a frozen dinner doesn't have a dessert," Chandra Hayes, freshman undecided, said. "I really like frozen turkey dinners, but when they come with the apple cobbler, I never eat it."

"The apple cobbler gets gross because it gets overcooked with the rest of the meal. I like my fruit cold," she said.

The least expensive of the frozen turkey dinners is the Food Club turkey dinner. The Food Club dinner costs a little more than one dollar, but like the Banquet brand dinner, it has no dessert.

The inexpensive Food Club brand turkey dinner has turkey and gravy with dressing, mashed potatoes and corn. The fat content is 10 grams.

Thanksgiving meals traditionally involve the consumption of turkey. But many students who are faced with a Thanksgiving meal away from home choose to eat something different.

"Last summer, I ate lots of TV dinners," Heather Hjetland, junior in agricultural journalism, said. "My favorite brand was Budget Gourmet."

"I wouldn't get a frozen turkey dinner, because, come on, that turkey isn't real," she said. "For $2, you're not going to get quality turkey."

"It's like Spam or something."

Other students said they would purchase a different form of frozen food than the conventional TV dinner for their Thanksgiving dinner.

"I'm not a big fan of those frozen TV dinners," Nathan Lange, freshman in environmental design, said.

"Personally, I'd rather eat frozen pizzas or chicken pot pies."

Shawn Morgan, junior in milling science and management, said he loved frozen pot pies.

"I've been eating pot pies ever since I was a little kid," Morgan said. "I used to get into fights with other kids on the best way to eat them."

"I don't like the TV dinners because they're always too small, and there's always something in there that just sucks."

Aaron Clark, sophomore in business administration, said he also preferred pot pies to TV dinners.

"TV dinners just piss me off," he said. "I don't like the way the mashed potatoes taste — they're always fake and flaky."

Frozen-food aisles at supermarkets sell more individually sold frozen vegetables and dinner rolls.

"Our sales of vegetables and dinner rolls increase every year, especially around the holiday season," Mactaggart said. "Everyone has to have vegetables and warm rolls with their meals."

Angie Funston, junior in elementary education, said Thanksgiving dinners just wouldn't be the same without warm dinner rolls.

"Dinner rolls are my favorite part of Thanksgiving dinner," she said. "I eat two to three rolls, and I always eat them with butter and honey."

Frozen turkey dinners, chicken pot pies and other frozen dinners are a cheap, simple alternative to Thanksgiving meals. But, as Colgan said, it's not as cheap and simple as going home.

"I love going home for Thanksgiving," he said. "The food costs me nothing, and it's simple because I don't even have to clean up afterwards."

TV dinners have many of the same foods people will stuff themselves with during the Thanksgiving holiday. However, TV dinners lack the portions the fattening holiday is famous for.

Recipe basics for a Thanksgiving on your own

PUMPKIN PIE

- 1 16-ounce can pumpkin
- 3/4 cup sugar
- 1 teaspoon ground cinnamon
- 1/2 teaspoon ground ginger
- 1/2 teaspoon ground nutmeg
- 3 eggs
- 1 50-1/3-ounce can (2/3 cup) evaporated milk
- 1/2 cup milk
- pastry for single-crust pie

Oven 375 degrees

In a large mixing bowl, combine pumpkin, sugar, cinnamon, ginger, nutmeg and 1/2 teaspoon salt. Add eggs, and with a fork, lightly beat eggs into pumpkin mixture. Add the evaporated milk and milk; mix well. Place a pastry-lined 9-inch pie plate on oven rack; pour in pumpkin mixture. Cover edge of pie with foil. Bake in a 375-degree oven for 25 minutes. Remove foil; bake for 25 to 30 minutes more or until a knife inserted off-center comes out clean. Cool. Cover and chill to store. Serves eight. Source: Better Homes and Gardens, New Cook Book

CRANBERRY SAUCE

- 2 cups water
- 1-3/4 to 2 cups sugar
- 4 cups cranberries (16 ounces)

In a large saucepan, combine water and sugar. Bring to boil, stirring to dissolve sugar. Boil rapidly for 5 minutes. Add cranberries; return to boiling. Cook, uncovered, over high heat 5-6 minutes or until skins pop. Remove from heat. Serve warm or chilled with poultry, pork or beef. Makes about 5 cups.

NOTE: To mold Cranberry Sauce, cook 10 to 12 minutes more during the final cooking time or until a drop gels on a cold plate. Turn into a 4-cup mold; chill till firm. Unmold.

BASIC BREAD DRESSING

- 1 pound onion, small dice
- 1/2 pound celery, small dice
- 1/2 pound fat such as butter, turkey fat, or chicken fat

- 2 pounds white bread, 2 days old
- 1 ounce chopped parsley
- 1 teaspoon sage
- 1/2 teaspoon thyme
- 1/2 teaspoon marjoram
- 1/2 teaspoon white pepper
- 2 teaspoons salt
- 1-2 pint chicken stock, cold

1. Sauté the onion and celery lightly in the fat until tender but not browned. Cool thoroughly.
2. Cut the bread into small cubes. (If desired, crusts may be trimmed first.)
3. Combine the bread and cooked vegetables in a large stainless steel bowl. Add the herbs and seasonings and toss gently until all ingredients are well mixed.

4. Add the stock a little at a time, and mix the dressing lightly after each addition. Add just enough to make the dressing slightly moist, neither dry nor soggy. Adjust the seasonings.
5. Place in a greased bake pan and bake at 375 degrees until hot at the center, or about one hour.

VARIATION: Giblet dressing: Add 1/2 pound cooked, chopped chicken or turkey gizzards and hearts to the dressing before adding the stock.

ROAST TURKEY

- 1 turkey, dressed, 20 pounds
- 8 ounces onions, chopped medium salt
- 4 ounces carrots, chopped medium pepper
- 4 ounces celery, chopped, medium oil

1. Remove giblets from cavity of turkey. Check inside of turkey to make sure it has been well cleaned. Lock the wings in place by twisting the wing tips behind the back of the turkey.
2. Season the inside of the turkey with salt and pepper. Rub the skin thoroughly with oil.

3. Place the turkey on one side in a roasting pan, on a rack if possible.
4. Place in an oven preheated to 325 degrees.

5. Roast for 1 1/2 hours. Turn the turkey on the other side. Roast another 1 1/2 hours. Baste turkey with dripping (fat only) every 30 minutes.
6. While turkey is roasting, place turkey heart, gizzard and neck in a saucepan. (Reserve the liver for another use, or add to bread dressing.) Cover the giblets with water and simmer until tender, about 2-3 hours. Reserve the broth and giblets for gravy.

7. Turn the turkey breast up. Place mirepoix in the pan.
8. Return the turkey to the oven and continue to roast. Baste occasionally by spooning the fat in the pan over the turkey.

9. Turkey is done when a thermometer inserted into the thickest part of the inside of the thigh reads 180 degrees. Total roasting time is about 5 hours.
10. Remove the turkey from roasting pan and let stand in a warm place at least 15 minutes before carving.

Homepage sites lead to research journey

Darin Siefkes
contributing writer

It's almost Thanksgiving, which means it's time for all students to start those research papers they have been putting off until the last possible moment.

Farrell Library blows, interlibrary loans will take until next semester, and a road trip to Jayhawkville to visit a real library is very annoying.

Where can that research be done at the last second?

The Internet has the answer.

University of Kansas
(http://kuhttp.cc.ukans.edu/history/)

The University of Kansas is good for something other than providing an easy win for our Wildcat football team. It has compiled the most comprehensive guides to history resources on the Internet.

Everything is alphabetized for easy access and is already linked to help send researchers on their way.

To make things even easier, it has separate pages for subject areas, such as military history, demographics and scores of other subjects.

The biggest problem of this page is that it is huge. I suggest clearing your memory cache before downloading this page or Netscape can lock up because of the multitude of information that this page contains.

Library of Congress
(http://lcweb.loc.gov/homepage/lchp.html)

The Library of Congress normally has a good page that I highly recommend for all surfers out there.

For some strange reason, this page isn't up temporarily. (Maybe the government couldn't pay the electric bill.) I would expect it back up once the government's present financial difficulties are resolved.

World Wide Web Virtual Library for Engineering
(http://arioch.gsfc.nasa.gov/wwwv/engineering.html)

Those with engineering problems need to check out the World Wide Web Virtual Library for Engineering. Mechanical, nuclear, environmental — it is all covered in this complete guide to engineering on the net.

This page is so complete it even includes links to various standard committees. Links to engineering-only servers are also here so if the info you want isn't listed, go look there.

All of the significant research institutes, as well as some of the others, are linked here too.

There are also links to various engineering firms to help researchers find real-world examples.

American Educational Research Association
(http://tikun.edu.asu.edu/acra/home.html)

Students needing up-to-date research on education need to check out the American Educational Research Association's homepage. This page will set anyone up with enough discussion groups by e-mail to help solve any problem.

It also has a good resource page with information and research for teaching K-12 and many of the specialties.

Stones record classics in latest release

Sara Smith
contributing writer

The Rolling Stones might be old, but they're not tired.

"Stripped," the new acoustic Stones album of mostly obscure classics, was recorded from performances in small clubs in Amsterdam and Paris, and in studio rehearsals — most of the songs hadn't been performed in more than 20 years.

"Jumping Jack Flash" and "Paint It, Black" are noticeably absent. "Satisfaction" is nowhere to be found. You can hear those on the radio.

Oh, sure, "Stripped" has hits on it — but only a few. "Street Fighting Man" still sounds mean acoustic, even over Jagger's odd, wobbly vocal on the track. "Let it Bleed," however, has perhaps even more life on "Stripped" than ever. And "Angie," well, maybe it should have just never been written. But the version on "Stripped" isn't bad — it's actually more tolerable than the original.

"Stripped" is just the Stones jamming — when they play Robert Johnson's "Love in Vain," Ron Wood and Keith Richards stop, mess around a bit and start up again. "Love in Vain," by the way, is one of the high points of the album.

This is not an Unplugged album, by the way — Mick Jagger doesn't like those. And the Rolling Stones don't need MTV's sanction to put out an acoustic album.

If "Voodoo Lounge" was a brave move in a different direction, "Stripped" is an even braver one backwards, back to the band's roots — playing the blues live.

Maybe a greatest-hits album would have seemed like a logical move for the band, but "Stripped" is about as far from one of those as you can get.

The Stones' first single off "Stripped" is a cover of Bob Dylan's "Like a Rolling Stone," which is performed with an ease the band couldn't have achieved even 10 years ago — it wouldn't have been taken seriously. The words "How does it feel?" coming from the Stones have more visceral punch behind them than in Dylan's popular 1965 version. Bobby Keys on saxophone doesn't hurt either.

The Stones have also put a little something extra on the "Stripped" CD itself — video highlights from their Voodoo Lounge CD-ROM. With the right amount of memory on your computer, you can access live videos of "Shattered," "Tumbling Dice" and "Like a Rolling Stone."

Make no mistake — just because Jagger doesn't want to sing "Satisfaction" for the 600th time live (seriously, he's done it that much) on this album doesn't mean the band has slowed down a bit.

Jagger even pokes a bit of fun at himself and his age — he's 52 — in "The Spider and the Fly," replacing the lyric "she was coming flirty, she looked about 30," with "she looked about 50," stumbling over the last word a bit.

Keith Richards is growing old a little less gracefully.

"Nobody's taken a rock 'n' roll band this far," he said in an interview with the Associated Press. "And we've had to live with (getting called) the dinosaurs of rock, the grandfathers, the dons. ... Either you crumble under that, or you say, 'Yeah, man? You get up on stage with me. I'd like to see you try it.'"

"We've got plenty of juice in us yet."

INTERNET

He suggested "A Brief Citation Guide for Internet Sources in History and the Humanities" by Melvin Page as a guide. Those wishing to find this guide can try requesting it from Page at (pagem@etsuarts.east-tenn-st.edu), Parillo said.

Parillo said another problem was Internet sites might not be permanent.

"You can cite a source, and two weeks later, it's not there," he said.

On reliability, Parillo said that if students find something they think is great information, they should try to check it with sources elsewhere and see what kind of verification they can come up with.

"The Internet is often compared to a library, but it is a library with no filing system and where people can take books off the shelves and put them on whenever they want," he said.

Richard Hendricks, student consultant at Computing and Network Services, said there was no way the reliability of anything on the Internet could be guaranteed.

He also said many sites on the Internet are biased by what the authors think is important enough to put on them.

MUSIC

Guest artist to lead jazz in All Faiths

Becky Schulz
staff reporter

The Department of Music has brought in a guest instructor for the jazz ensembles.

Dennis Mackrel, a professional drummer from New York, has just returned from the Berlin Jazz Festival, where he performed with the Carla Bley Very Large Band.

Mackrel said he would be at K-State for a week. During his stay, he is conducting private lessons for the drummers, directing the Jazz Ensembles and performing a concert with the Jazz Quintet.

The concert is at 6 tonight at All Faiths Chapel. Dennis Wilson, professor of jazz studies, is now touring with the Carnegie Hall Band.

Wilson said he picked a drummer to fill a void and to allow the drummers to receive the instruction they need.

Mackrel is an expert on the drum set jazz bands use. Wilson said K-State has excellent percussion instructors, but no true instruction for drum sets.

"I picked a drummer, because that's what I need. They'll get more from him than from me," Wilson said.

"It's good for the drummers, but also for the jazz bands."

Mackrel said that to speak to drummers, you need someone who can speak drums.

Although most instruments revolve around notes, the drum set doesn't.

"The drum set is an instrument unto itself," Mackrel said.

The drum is the foundation of a band, Mackrel said. If the drums get louder, the band will play louder and vice versa.

The drums can also shape the emotional tone of the music. He said if the drums are playing an upbeat tone, the audience will tend to react in an upbeat manner.

"The drums can play a leadership role," Mackrel said. "The drums can shape the dynamics of the music."

Mackrel said he was primarily a professional. However, he has been conducting more clinics. He also said he enjoyed working with students because of their hunger and excitement to learn.

"I hope to expose some of the students here to ideas that they might not have thought about," Mackrel said. "Certain aspects that don't get covered, like rhythm."

Mackrel said he was impressed with the jazz department at K-State. He said the students were focused and serious, something that usually isn't found at a large university.

"Dennis (Wilson) has done a lot of work with the musicians to get them to play at the level they are play-

Federal shutdown affects state agencies

Associated Press

The U.S. Coast Guard Pay and Personnel Center in Topeka and Social Security and Internal Revenue Service offices throughout Kansas appeared most affected by the federal government shutdown on Tuesday.

Spokespeople in those offices took the furloughing of employees in stride, however, hopeful of a quick resolution to the budget impasse in Washington that caused the problem.

"We hope our civilian employees enjoy a couple of days off and we get them back shortly," said Chief Warrant Officer Rich Bure at the Coast Guard Pay and Personnel Center, where 90 of 100 civilian employees were sent home after President Clinton ordered the shutdown of non-essential federal services.

"Everyone is hoping for a quick turnaround on this," Bure said. "We expect to continue to operate as normally as we can."

The Pay and Personnel Center processes paychecks for the entire Coast Guard — about 37,000 active duty personnel, 8,000 reservists and thousands of employees.

Besides the 100 civilian employees, the center has 130 active duty Coast Guard personnel, all of whom remained on the job and can pick up the slack if need be, Bure said.

Things slowed appreciably at Social Security offices across Kansas. While retirees will keep getting their checks, the offices quit processing applications for Social Security cards and applications for retirement benefits — presumably for the duration of the budget impasse.

In Wichita, only 11 essential employees out of a work force of about 250 remained on the job at the Social Security office, and even sharper reductions were reported at other offices.

Just one person was left on duty in the Mission and Topeka offices. Four regional offices in Salina, Hays, Garden City and Parsons were to be closed.

During the lunch hour, the Social Security office in Wichita had three visitors, and all were able to complete their business.

One dropped off an application card for a daughter. One picked up some literature about Social Security benefits. The third wouldn't say what she was there for, but said she was able to get it handled.

"They weren't as busy this time as when I picked up the papers," said Judy Washington of Wichita. "I got right in and out."

A handwritten sign next to the door to the office said no new applications for benefits would be accepted and only limited business would be conducted until after the federal shutdown ended.

They did all they could for as long as they could at the Hays-area Social Security office.

The office opened to the public at 9 a.m., and the 13 staff members were all at work well before that, taking care of as much work as possible before they were sent home at 9:30 a.m., Branch Manager Sue Cumming said.

"I forgot all about it," one woman said of the shutdown. She got the forms she was after before the Hays office closed.

At the state's only major tourist attraction operated by the federal government, the Eisenhower Center in Abilene, director Dan Holt said the late president's library was shut down and about 50 employees sent home.

Holt said two maintenance and two security personnel would remain on job at the center, which includes the burial site of Dwight Eisenhower and his wife, Mamie, a museum, library and visitors center.

McConnell Air Force Base planned to furlough 312 civilian workers while designating 47 as essential personnel. They work in the base fire department, weather operations, base operations and in the medical group.

On the military side, it was business as usual at McConnell, Fort Riley and Fort Leavenworth.

Chris Watney, spokesperson for the U.S. Attorney's office in Wichita, said all of the office's personnel reported, then certain individuals were notified whether they had been designated as emergency workers.

"You can be deemed emergency personnel at the discretion of the U.S. attorney, so those numbers can and probably will change," she said.

Initially, the U.S. attorney, the first assistant U.S. attorney, all of the criminal staff and a few other individuals were designated to continue working, she said.

posals. He said he was confident there would be enough general-education courses approved by fall 1997 to go ahead with the plan.

"Just within the last 24 hours, we've gotten 11 more proposals," Balk said.

"If we implement by 1997, I don't see how anyone could deny that we wouldn't have enough seats," he said.

About 133 sections or almost 9,000 seats have been approved as general-education courses.

However, Balk said 143 sections or more than 11,000 seats are under review.

Balk also said the College of Arts and Sciences would not be flooded with students needing to take general-education courses, although the majority of the courses would probably be offered by the College of Arts and Sciences.

Kenneth Klabunde, arts and sciences senator, relinquished his speaking time so Jay Goodwin, junior in pre-law, could speak.

Goodwin said he had several problems with the general-education proposal. He said his main concern was it dictates how classes are taught and this would terminate diversity.

"It's talking about the way classes are taught," he said. "I don't believe one size fits all. If this idea about the way things would be taught fits all classes, why not implement it University-wide? I don't see you putting that forward. You can't expect math to be taught like PE."

"One teaching style doesn't promote diversity. It ignores the fact that people learn differently."

Aubrey Abbott, Student Senate representative to Faculty Senate, was not given the opportunity to speak during the meeting but after the meeting voiced Student Senate's support for the measure.

"We were concerned that without general education, the value of our degree might be lessened," she said.

"This is a great opportunity to broaden our horizons and take classes outside of our major. We support the idea of the plan, but there are some kinks in the policy that must be worked out. That's the Faculty Senate's job to decide the specifics of the proposal."

In other business, Senate passed an Academic Fresh Start proposal that would allow returning K-State students to neutralize some old grades.

It would provide for the computation of an alternative grade point average and for the use of that GPA in all University-wide academic policies based on cumulative GPA.

Students would qualify for the program if they meet two criteria: They must sit out of school for three years, and they must have a 2.5 GPA for their first 12 hours upon returning.

The Academic Fresh Start students would only be eligible for University academic honors after they have completed 60 hours in residence with at least 50 hours in graded courses after returning to K-State.

The program would not delete anything from the student's academic record. Grades earned before the Academic Fresh Start would remain on students' transcripts along with their cumulative GPA.

The transcript would also indicate the starting point of the Academic Fresh Start.

HANSEN

As an active student on campus, Hansen is involved with several different clubs.

"I think I'm most proud of being part of the Student Alumni Board, Chimes and being an orientation leader," Hansen said.

Hansen is also a member of the Pre-Law Club, Engineering Student Council, American Nuclear Engineering Society, Student Senate and Order of Omega, as well as a member of Theta Xi fraternity.

While most greek organizations prefer their presidents to be seniors, Hansen was voted by his brothers as Theta Xi's president as a sophomore.

"It was tough and difficult," Hansen said. "I had to earn and gain respect from the guys and show them that I was mature and old enough to lead them."

In his current studies as a nuclear engineer major, Hansen currently carries a 3.66 grade point average.

"Chris is excellent with details and being prepared," Rush said. "He does a great job of delegating authority and touching base with his peers."

Hansen said that things run much more smoothly when you get to know the people you're working with.

"It takes time and energy to get to know the people you work with," Hansen said. "You have to get past the nuts and bolts. When you do that, you make more progress and really get to know people."

Although graduation is still a year away, Hansen said he has already started planning his life after graduation.

"I'd really like to study overseas and then come back and go to law school somewhere," Hansen said.

CITY

nance says flashing signs would be allowed in neighborhood shopping centers like Westloop Shopping Center, Aggieville and service commercial districts.

Carlin said she is not sure of the significance of flashing signs in Aggieville.

Mayor Edith Stunkel said she is concerned about how public nuisances are defined in the ordinance.

Frost said he doesn't think public nuisances need to be defined by the commission.

"Either leave the term in and let the court apply standards or take the word out," he said.

If commissioners want a specific set of standards of a public nuisance, they should create them, Frost said.

Hall said business owners are not going to display signs for their businesses that are public nuisances or unattractive.

"You've got to trust, somewhat, some common sense of merchants out there," he said.

Four out of seven members of the planning board, which decided on areas where flashing signs should be allowed, are new and haven't heard the public's concern about signs, Jerry Petty, director of community development, said.

"It's important for those who think they have been heard to be prepared to be heard again," he said.

A maximum of three banners would be able to be displayed at a business under the revised ordinance.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said a maximum of three banners could potentially be too many hanging in front some businesses.

Stunkel said perhaps the city could include a limit on banners, depending on the size of a business.

Petty said that would defeat the purpose of the revisions.

"If we try to require them in terms of building size, we're back to issuing permits," he said.

Article nine of the ordinance strongly encourages a public hearing with a developer and the neighborhood surrounding a proposed Planned Unit Developments site before making a formal application to PUD.

The applicant will be required to provide a written statement with the application, describing the neighborhood meeting and issues raised.

Petty said the flood-plain regulations, which have to be approved by regulatory agencies before they can be passed, should be sent to the regulatory agencies for review.

The commission gave Petty permission to send the draft of the article to the appropriate agencies for review since it could take a while for a response.

Moving past stereotypes

Black Panther Party co-founder tells his story

Nikola Zytkov
staff reporter

Bobby Seale captured an audience's imagination Wednesday night, the same way people said he captured the imagination of the nation 29 years ago as co-founder of the Black Panther Party. People cannot seem to get past the stereotypes the government, FBI and police have been feeding them, Seale told a packed Forum Hall audience after receiving a standing ovation. "People view it as some black militant hate group," Seale said. Several books and a recent movie have not helped to dispel the myth, Seale said. "Recently, there was a film directed by Mario Van Peebles. Ninety percent of what is portrayed on the screen never happened," Seale said. The 1995 "Panther" attempted to reveal the events behind the formation of the Black Panther Party and the lives of Party members.

Seale said the film was a piece of bootleg fiction and denounced the depiction of his character.

"I've been running all over this country trying to straighten the youth out about this," Seale said.

Some of the stereotypes depict Black Panthers as originating from street gangs that had meetings in places like night clubs.

See SEALE Page 5

Mixed opinions surround Panthers

Nikola Zytkov
staff reporter

Stern, young black men and women donning black berets, shiny boots and guns might be the way many remember the Black Panther Party.

But behind the militant image and revolutionary language stood a group of individuals frustrated with police brutality, intent on uniting their communities and fighting racism in all forms.

"There were some who were militant and some who wanted social programs and self-defense," said Fred Watson, professor of African-American history and ethnic studies. The Party was formed by college students Huey P. Newton and Bobby Seale in 1966, during a period of growing dissatisfaction among blacks. The Black Panther Party and its ideas appealed to many blacks, Watson said.

"The reason a lot of people in black communities liked them was because they were disappointed with the results of the Civil Rights Act of 1964," Watson said.

The Act, which outlawed segregation in public places and generated affirmative-action programs, brought more direct advantages to middle-class blacks than poor blacks, Watson said.

ATTORNEY GENERAL

Projects address domestic violence

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

Continuing education about domestic violence is essential at the high-school and college levels, Attorney General Carla Stovall said Wednesday when she visited K-State.

"Domestic violence should be called undomestic because there is nothing domestic about beating somebody," Stovall said. "We need to teach young people that it's not OK to hit and abuse."

During her term as attorney general, Stovall has focused on educating state residents about domestic violence, increasing juvenile delinquency and child death rates.

Kansas will have some assistance fighting crime when it receives $426,000 from the Federal Crime Bill in mid-December.

The funds will be split equally between police, discretionary preceding, victim advocate groups and courts, Stovall said.

The Kansas State Child Death Review

Board, which Stovall assists, recently released an annual report on the causes of death for children under 18 in Kansas between July 1, 1993, and June 30, 1994.

Research showed of the 466 child deaths that occurred during the study, 34 were homicides, 18 were suicides, 64 were caused by vehicular accidents, 31 were from non-vehicular accidents, 53 were caused by Sudden Infant Death Syndrome, 260 deaths were natural causes and six deaths were undetermined.

"Many people were surprised at the number of suicides. They just didn't think it was going on that much," Stovall said.

The Committee for Brighter Sunshine Laws is another project Stovall said she has helped organize.

The sunshine laws allow the public to attend all meetings with the exception of executive sessions.

Public bodies are allowed to discuss personnel matters, buying or selling of property, matters with its attorney, trade secrets and employer/employee negotiations in closed executive sessions.

The committee met for the first time a couple of weeks ago, she said.

"It's a chance to sit down and talk about whether we should open meetings up," Stovall said.

Although many meetings are open, the committee discussed the possibility of requiring executive meetings to be opened or tape-recorded, she said.

"Public officials don't want to have tape recording," Stovall said.

The media's cost for certain public records is also a concern for the Brighter Sunshine Committee, she said.

"It cost the media $3.50 to get a single driver's license record," Stovall said.

The cost to large media sources can be staggering, she said.

GREAT AMERICAN SMOKEOUT

Cigarettes snuffed out at annual Smokeout

Kimberly Heffling
staff reporter

It's time to throw away your cigarettes and hide your lighter — at least for one day.

Today is the Great American Smokeout, sponsored by the American Cancer Society since 1977.

During the Smokeout in 1993, 2.4 million smokers reported quitting, and 6 million smokers reported reducing the number of cigarettes smoked on that day.

In addition, about 1.6 million smokers quit smoking 1-10 days after the Smokeout.

That same day in 1993, 107 million packs of cigarettes were not smoked, resulting in an estimated $18.1 million not spent for cigarettes.

The goal of the Smokeout is to promote and encourage smoking cessation by helping smokers realize that if they can quit for one day, they can quit permanently.

"I'm going to try to quit," Mike Hannan, sophomore undecided, said as he smoked his last cigarette outside the K-State Student Union. "This is the last cigarette in the pack. You can't just throw away cigarettes."

Hannan said when he'd tried quitting in the past, he tended to eat a lot, had the shakes and had several other side effects.

"I got real cranky," Hannan said.

However, Hannan said he was still going to try to quit.

"I hope this is permanent," Hannan said, "but I'm not doing this in honor of the Smokeout. I'm doing this in honor of my own health."

Tom McKenzie and Mike Clotfelter, juniors in architecture, said they frequently took breaks from studio to enjoy a cigarette or two on the steps of Seaton Hall.

However, both said they were going to try to quit today — at least temporarily.

"It all depends on what my grade is on my intro to planning test tomorrow," Clotfelter said, "but I guess I'll give it a shot."

Clotfelter said he heard about the Smokeout through word of mouth.

Worldwide, every 10 seconds a person dies as a result of tobacco use. Tobacco products kill about 3 million people a year, and this number is increasing, according to the World Health Organization.

Tips to kick the habit

- Throw away your cigarettes.
- Hide your ashtrays.
- Clean the house.
- Clean the car.
- Chew on something else, like carrot or cinnamon sticks, gum or hard candy.
- Try to exercise.
- Get support from family and friends.
- Drink lots of fluids, but don't drink coffee. The caffeine becomes more potent when you stop smoking.

Board of Education delays block scheduling

James Dierking
staff reporter

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 students will not see scheduling changes in the next school year, the Board of Education announced Monday night.

"After considerable thought, we've come to the decision to delay a block-scheduling proposal," said Sylvester Benson, transition committee chair and high-school principal.

The board agreed in April to consider block scheduling. A specific schedule was being worked on and was to be implemented on the ninth-grade level at the beginning of the 1996-97 school year.

This type of scheduling lengthens the class period but shortens the time it takes to complete a class as a whole.

The committee's decision will delay the proposal to sometime next year with possible implementation in 1997-98.

"I'm personally disappointed we're going to have to delay for a year," Debbie Nuss, board member, said. "It wasn't that things were wrong. It's that things could be better."

"I think it's very unfortunate that in all the public input, we got bogged down in the scheduling, not looking at what was educationally beneficial to the students," she said.

Mary Nichols, board member, said she was supportive of the extended time to develop a proposal.

"I believe every individual wants the best for their children, and that may take a longer time," she said.

Other members also said the extension would be beneficial.

"We just want a clearer picture of the change and how it will help," Larry Weaver, board member, said.

More than 25 parents and community members attended the meeting in support of delaying implementation of the proposal.

"There isn't a resistance to change. We're just saying, 'Let's think about it a little more.' Put a proposal on the table, and let's talk about it," said Farhad Azadivar, an audience member who has children in middle school and high school in Manhattan.

In addition to the announcement, Benson presented graduation requirements to the board.

The requirements call for 21 credits, including English, social science, laboratory science, health, physical education and mathematics.

In the news

► HOOTERS IGNORES RECOMMENDATION TO HIRE MALE SERVERS

ATLANTA (AP) — Imagine sliding into a booth at Hooters, skimming the menu, then giving your order to a scantily clad man. No way, said the restaurant chain that built its reputation on its perky Hooters Girls.

The company will ignore an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission recommendation that it hire men to work alongside the women. Mostly male customers are taking Hooters' side.

"Hooters guys is like a hot dish of ice cream — you don't want your ice cream served hot," said Phil Jamieson, who had lunch Wednesday at the Hooters at Underground Atlanta, where waitresses wore orange pins saying "Save Our Jobs."

The draw at Hooters isn't the burgers or the chicken wings — it's the lively waitresses in skimpy uniforms. The recommendation from the EEOC isn't binding, but it allows the agency to file a complaint if ignored.

"A lot of places serve good burgers. The Hooters Girls, with their charm and all-American sex appeal, are what our customers come for," said Mike McNeil, a Hooters vice president, at a news conference in Washington.

In Atlanta, the mostly male clientele during the busy lunch hour scoffed at the idea of being served by men in bright orange hot pants and tight, white T-shirts or tank tops, the standard uniform for Hooters waitresses.

"If I wanted to see that, I'd go to other places, which of course I don't frequent anyway," said Malcolm Gibson, 53, a computer consultant from Marietta.

► CAR CRASHES INTO BURGER KING

Shattered glass was sprayed into Burger King on Custer Hill at Fort Riley during the dinner hour Tuesday.

At about 5:30 p.m., a 1989 Ford sedan came to a stop in the restaurant's dining room after driving through a plate glass window.

The driver of the vehicle was a teenager. He was charged with not having a valid operator's license and reckless driving.

A 2-year-old who was eating in the facility was treated and released at Irwin Army Community Hospital.

► BOARD HIRES EDITOR IN CHIEF

The Collegian editor in chief was hired by the Board of Student Publications Inc. Monday.

Mike Marlett, senior in journalism, was selected. He is the managing editor for the Collegian this semester.

"I'd like to continue the strong tradition of design and reach out to areas of campus that might not get as much coverage," Marlett said.

Marlett said plans to assemble a strong, diverse staff with an emphasis on quality and accuracy.

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said Marlett had an extremely successful term as summer 1995 editor.

"He brought together an excellent summer staff which consistently produced strong weekly papers and the best Preview edition we've ever had, hands down," Johnson said. "He is really committed to serving the K-State campus with a strong paper."

Lafene panel discusses eating disorders with students

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

Eating disorders are common on college campuses, a panel of Lafene Health Center professionals said Tuesday night.

"It's a fairly common problem on college campuses. A lot of people who are depressed use this as a mechanism to cope," Dan Martin, Lafene physician, said.

Cindy Burke, director of health education at Lafene, said many freshmen feel uncomfortable in a new setting and may revert back to eating problems they thought they had overcome.

The panel, made up of a physician, two health educators, a dietitian and a psychologist, met with students to answer questions on the treatment of eating disorders Tuesday night.

Many times people suffering from eating disorders do not want to admit they have a problem, Reita Currie, health educator for Lafene, said.

"Often, it takes a lot of courage to take that walk to see the counselor," Currie said.

Sometimes it is difficult for people to begin treatment for eating disorders because it means they have to gain weight if they are anorexic or bulimic, Currie said.

"We know that a lot of students on campus will not come out of the closet and admit they have a problem," Burke said.

But friends should not accuse one another of having an eating disorder, Burke said.

When accusations are used, the person with a disorder feels as though his friend is saying he or she looks bad. The person with an eating disorder will get angry and deny the problem when faced with an accusation, Burke said.

Instead of accusations, a friend should tell the person with an eating disorder that they care and try to take the blame off of them, Burke said.

The first time a person is approached with the fact that he or she has a disorder, the problem will probably be denied. Instead of giving up, a friend should keep trying to convince the person to get help, Burke said.

"The first time, they will deny they have a problem, but don't stop. Let it drop, and then come back to it," Burke said.

Martin said tough love was sometimes the only way a person could get a friend to seek help with their disorder.

"A lot of the time, people show up because a friend got them by the ear and drug them in," Martin said.

Dorothy Farrand, psychologist at Lafene, said University faculty were in

PANTHERS

"The poor people couldn't take advantage of the Civil Rights Act," Watson said.

Panther leadership emerged from poor, black communities.

"Two brothers in the hood got together and came up with the plan," said Jawwad Abdulhaqq, president of Black Student Union.

Newton and Seale came up with a Ten-Point Program — a composite of ideas they believed were necessary for the livelihood of minorities in America.

The 10 points were outlined in each addition of the Panther's weekly paper.

Under the heading "What We Want, What We Believe" were points including "We want freedom. We want power to determine the destiny of our Black Community." "We want full employment for our people." "We want an immediate end to police brutality and murder of black people," and "We want freedom for all black men held in federal, state, county and city prisons and jail."

The last of the ideas was justified by the notion that blacks had not received a fair and impartial trial by a jury of their peers, and therefore their imprisonments did not follow the Constitution.

In his 1993 book, "This Side of Glory," David Hilliard, former chief of staff for the Party, said the demands of the Ten-Point Program were still alive.

"More than 20 years after Huey first wrote it, the Ten-Point Program remains a complete, concise statement of what minorities need and want," Hilliard said.

Panthers wanted to achieve their goal of self-determination by setting up their own programs and businesses, Watson said.

The efforts included voter registration drives and a restructuring of school curricula.

"They were going to elect people who were responsive to them," Watson said. "They also wanted to control the curriculum of the schools in the inner cities. They wanted to add courses in African American history and bring in more black teachers."

The Panthers began programs that included tutoring children, sickle-cell anemia testing, breakfast programs and free medical care clinics, Abdulhaqq said.

"They just really covered every aspect of the community," Abdulhaqq said. "They symbolized that you can make a difference right where you're at, with your own resources."

Seale said that at the height of the organization's success, the Party had 40 chapters, more than 5,000 members, an international section, a weekly newspaper with a 250,000-plus readership and free Breakfast for Children, shoes, medical and legal programs in operation from Winston-Salem, Mass. to Seattle.

One of the more controversial parts of their approach were the guns Panthers strapped themselves with.

"They were attempting to defend their neighborhoods because there were a lot of police-brutality incidents going on," Watson said.

In his 1968 autobiography, "Seize the Time," Seale tried to dispel myths about Panther gun use.

"We don't use guns, we have never used our guns to go into the white community and shoot up white people," Seale said. "We only defend ourselves against anybody, be they black, blue, green, or red, who attacks us unjustly and tries to murder us and kill us for implementing our programs."

There were legitimate reasons for the presence of weapons, Abdulhaqq said.

"The time called for the type of action that they used," Abdulhaqq said. "They were trying to police the police."

Although the Panthers had the right to bear arms, the guns, along with Panther revolutionary plans, quickly attracted the attention of the FBI.

Then-FBI director J. Edgar Hoover called the Black Panther Party public enemy No. 1 and the most active and dangerous black extremist group in the United States.

"The Panthers began to dissolve as police raids, gun battles, IRS investigations, trials and prison terms decimated their ranks," Hilliard said.

With many Party leaders in jail or exiled in the late 1970s, the Party disintegrated in the late 1970s.

"There were internal as well as external conflicts," Abdulhaqq said.

The Panther party's leadership was always divided. Some of the leaders believed in militancy and revolution while others focused more on community building, Abdulhaqq said.

"Some of the dissension was created by the federal government," Abdulhaqq said. "The structure was breaking down, so it was hard to combat the things the FBI was doing."

Many Panther leaders are still unjustly jailed today, Abdulhaqq said.

in our opinion

Wetland legislation reeks of inconsistencies

What the government needs to do is come up with a specific definition of a wetland, and it needs to decide who should regulate them.

The 1985 Farm Bill contains legislation that will tell farmers what to do with their lands.

That is to say, it made it so farmers couldn't get their farm subsidies if they tiled up wetlands.

This legislation came about because through the 1970s and early '80s, a half-million acres per year were being destroyed.

Wetlands purify water and are nature's buffer against flooding. In Kansas, the state that ranks dead-last in U.S. water quality and has had repeated flooding disasters, wetlands should be a treasure.

Instead, farmers are pushing to have their red-tape bonds freed. The legislation's authors want to deregulate from 6 million to 20 million acres of land.

They want to do it by making land exempt if the wetland area is smaller than one acre, or if it has been farmed at least six of the last 10 years. And it isn't the only wetland legislation in Washington.

These exemptions were thrown out of the 1990 Farm Bill because one cannot verify if the land was planted, according to a National Audubon Society fact sheet.

In short, people could say the land has been farmed for as long as they could remember and it would suddenly become usable farmland.

This isn't scientific, and it isn't consistent. Inconsistency is not what the law should be about.

What the government needs to do is come up with a specific definition of a wetland, and it needs to decide who should regulate them.

And more importantly, it needs to educate farmers about the importance of wetlands.

Farmers might not resent regulation if they understood that almost half of the nation's flood damage is done to their unprotected lands and wetlands purifies the water that gives life to crops and livestock they work to produce.

Exposing holes in creationist arguments

I am a teacher. I present information to students and, with luck, get them to think about it. I have devoted my life to this goal. It follows, then, that I resent those with the opposite goal: to present disinformation and to get people to believe it, not think about it.

Jeremy Stephens, in his Nov. 9 column titled "Evolutionists deny Jesus Christ," follows the creationist line, whether from dedication or ignorance I cannot say.

This column contains so much disinformation that it would take twice as much space to refute as is available. (This is a common creationist tactic, one used to great effect in their "debates.")

Nonetheless, I shall attempt to bring some of Stephens' accusations into the light of day.

Stephens' first accusation is that there is something unfair about schools teaching evolution but not creationism.

This is the old "equal time" argument, written into law in a few states but ultimately rejected by the Supreme Court. The biggest flaw in the creationist argument is that they want creationism taught in science classes, where it has no place. There is no rule that says it can't be taught in philosophy or religion classes, even in high school.

I doubt Stephens' implications that University professors are afraid to talk about creationism because, "This is a state school; we can't talk about creation." I don't know a single professor at K-State who would take such a mealy-mouthed position.

The entire concept of academic freedom is based on our right to teach what we know to be correct, not what might be politically prudent.

Academic freedom also means we have the right not to teach what is incorrect despite outside pressure. In the classes I have taught that involve evolution, some students have raised the question of creationism and sometimes offered to bring in "guest experts" to discuss its merits.

I point out that I have limited time to teach my material and that I intend to teach what my experience has shown to be correct.

To waste class time on anything else would be unprofessional and unfair to other students.

Stephens goes even further by suggesting K-State will not allow discussion on issues such as creationism.

He also challenges "those who are fully knowledgeable about evolution" to engage in a discussion to see if they can "easily dispel all other theories." I have never heard of any rules against having such a discussion, but I also doubt if that will happen. There is no way anyone could fairly discuss evolution under such conditions, for it is too complex.

Universities offer semester courses on the subject, and these are by no means comprehensive.

It would take months to teach Stephens about evolution; that is supposing he would be willing to learn.

I will pass over Stephens' disinformation that evolution is full of holes, and "Charles Darwin retracted the whole idea before he died."

Instead, I would like to respond to the main accusation in the second half of his column, "Evolutionists deny Jesus Christ."

One of the creationists' favorite lies (not mere disinformation) is those who understand the fact of evolution make up a religious body whom they call "evolutionists."

They then compound this lie with an even bigger one, to the effect that "evolutionists" cannot possibly believe in God. (Creationists are pretty much alone in this slander, as was brought out in the Louisiana creationism case a few years ago, most U.S. religions support the teaching of evolution.)

I consider my relationship with God to be a personal and private one, but I will go public enough to state that I find no reason why my understanding of evolution should conflict with my belief in God.

Indeed, the patterns and mechanisms in evolution have such beauty and complexity that they could be described as divinely inspired. Why creationists think God would prefer to micro-manage the history of life on earth is more puzzling.

The answer to that might lie in another aspect of creationist belief, one that is more fundamental to their efforts than anything else they say. Stephens hinted at it in one of his questions: "Are you confident that man is a soulless animal?" (This question is an example of another creationist tactic, that of putting up a straw man to attack. Biologists don't say that man has no soul; they do agree that man is, at least biologically, an animal.)

This last question puts the true motives of the creationists into the light.

Basically, they are insecure with the idea that man might have evolved from "lower" animals rather than being an independent creation of God, and thus vastly more important than mere animals.

Lacking the self-confidence to withstand the thought of being animals, they deny the overwhelming logic of the scientific evidence, refusing to look at it, even refusing to think about it and decry evolution as an evil pseudo-religion.

To which I say, to Stephens and his supporters: Get a life.

EVOLUTION AND CHRIST

Editor,

I rather cringed at the headline "Evolutionists deny Jesus Christ" over the recent column by Jeremy Stephens.

I resist being labeled an evolutionist. I prefer to say I accept the scientific validity of evolution.

Like all scientific theories, evolution is subject to constant change as new evidence emerges, or as fresh interpretations of old evidence enhance our understanding. So-called "creation science" fails the basic test of a scientific theory because it accepts neither new evidence nor fresh interpretations; rather, "creation science" is set in stone like an immovable Rock of Ages.

As for evolution, Jeremy poses three questions: "First, where did the universe and all that is come from in the first place?" The cosmologist Steven Hawking, in "A Brief History of Time," looks behind the Big Bang and finds the hand of God.

That sounds fine to me. "Second, are you really ready to believe that time and pressure working on an enormous ball of gas could result in the complexity of the human ear and the oddity of the giraffe?"

Yes. After all, the universe's size and age are so huge that both are impossible for the human imagination to fully grasp.

"The earth is so old that its age means virtually nothing in our own concept of time."

If you were to compress the age of the earth into a single year, dinosaurs do not appear until Dec. 27, human civilization until less than a minute before midnight on Dec. 31 and Jesus Christ about seven seconds before the year's end.

"Finally, are you confident that man is a soulless animal?" No. I do not deny that men (and women) have souls. Nor do I deny Jesus Christ.

While I clearly look at these things differently than does Stephens, I have no quarrel with his religious faith because that is so inherently personal, a matter between him and his God.

Others, including many who are extremely devout and who have enriched our theology and our pulpits, have a religious faith and a set of religious beliefs that are quite different from Stephens' but just as valid for them as Stephen's is for him.

Large numbers of Christian theologians and ministers, and millions of faithful Christians, do not find their faith threatened by evolution or by any other finding of science, for that matter.

Their spirituality derives much of its strength because they can gaze in wonder, and with their minds open, at the immensity and the complexity and the beauty of God's creation and realize that the full truth of God's creation will forever elude them.

Budget struggle raises questions

For months, there has been talk the president would veto the budget bill approved by Congress and portions of the government would subsequently shut down. It happened.

The latest stop-gap spending measure was vetoed by the president. Tuesday morning, 800,000 federal employees went on furlough.

As a concerned citizen, I am curious about this situation. I have not been alive long enough to remember in detail the last time a Congress and a president fought out a budget battle.

Therefore, I would like to ask some questions about this situation. Mr. President, you have appeared very much in favor in the past of working together to form a compromise on items you disagreed with the Congress about.

However, you refused Speaker Newt Gingrich's and Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole's repeated requests to meet one-on-one and work out the budget. Why did you change position? Did it have anything to do with which adviser you were listening to at the time?

Those in the mainstream media have been closely watching this story and report it closely. However, the stories consist mostly of what Democrats have said and an attempt to get a Republican to respond to that statement, rather than the issue at hand.

In fact, the Associated Press stories about the budget on the front pages of Monday and Tuesday's Collegians don't even include a response from a Republican. Why do you prevent the Republicans from telling their side of the story?

There has also been much discussion about the many cuts the Republicans intend to implement in the budget. If there are so many cuts, why can't the press name a single important program that will actually receive less funding next year than it did this year? Are reductions in the rate of growth really cuts when more money is allocated than the year before?

This tendency to label all Republican spending measures as cuts began last year with the school lunch program debate. The press labeled the Republican-sponsored 4.5-percent spending increase in the program as a cut, while the president's 3.3-percent increase was not. Is 4.5 greater or less than 3.3?

Mr. President, in a May 1993 Investors Business Weekly article, you said your efforts to reduce the increase in Medicare and Medicaid spending from three times the rate of inflation to two times the rate of inflation was not a cut. Why do you insist today that Republican attempts to do essentially the same thing are cuts?

Mr. President, you continue to claim your plan will balance the budget in seven to 10 years, just as the Republicans' will, and do so without as much pain.

If so, why did the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) determine your plan would actually produce deficits between 180 and 209 billion dollars annually for the next seven years? Do you define a balanced budget as a budget with no deficit? Do you consider good effort to be synonymous with successful effort?

Mr. President, your own Office of Management and Budget (OMB) determined that 89 percent of the Department of Education, 99 percent of the Department of Housing and Urban Development and 67 percent of the Department of Commerce are composed of non-essential workers.

If this is the case, why are you so averse to removing one of these departments from the cabinet or at least reducing the size of their staffs to help balance the budget?

Medicare is made of two parts. Part A consists of hospital insurance and is financed almost entirely by the federal government.

Part B consists of a voluntary medical insurance program that covers most physician services. Enrollment is by choice, and a monthly premium is assessed ($31.80 in 1992). After the first $100 of premiums, the federal government will pay 80 percent of all amounts approved.

Congress has proposed raising this premium 4 dollars more than the president's plan, and this has been labeled as a cut. If a senior citizen pays higher premiums to stay with a private insurance company, can it be considered a tax?

These are 12 questions about the budget — 12 more are available upon request.

Leaders come in both sexes, but statistics show

Women face more obstacles

As we look at the makeup of the membership of Blue Key Senior Honorary, we notice a large majority of the members are female.

Some of us began to question the significance of the proportions and how it associated with leadership.

In addition, Blue Key serves as group facilitators for a freshman leadership class. Again, we noticed most of the students in the class were also female.

The odd reaction was some men in the class were intimidated by the abundance of female leaders. Some slouched down in their chairs, almost as if they wanted to be invisible.

They were extremely quiet, almost afraid to speak up in class. Normally, we might just classify these men as being poorly postured and shy, but now we know better (right, guys?).

Why would these bright young male leaders have to be intimidated about? Maybe it is because they felt neglected for once. Maybe it is because they felt frustrated, resentful or even fearful.

This massive influx of females in leadership positions on campus and off is relatively new.

As a matter of fact, Blue Key was an all-male organization until the mid-1970s. Women today are comprising more and more of the work force and leadership positions in general, and quite simply, society does not know how to deal with this new demographic change.

Some men, much like the young men in our leadership class, are facing issues that are totally new, issues that their grandfathers and great grandfathers rarely had to deal with. Issues that even their fathers may be unfamiliar with.

For example, in 1972, only 4 percent of those seeking MBAs were women and only 20 percent of the managerial or administrative positions were held by women. Whereas in 1994, 33 percent of those seeking MBAs were women and 44 percent of the managerial or administrative positions were held by women. Another example, in the United States in 1988 men contributed for 55 percent of the work force.

However, that figure is estimated to decrease to 53 percent by the year 2000. In contrast, women comprised 45 percent of the work force in 1988 and are expected to increase to 47 percent by the year 2000 (Management, by Griffin, 1996).

At any rate, gender-related problems and discrimination still exist in many organizations, whether they be companies, educational institutions, or government agencies.

One such example is the so-called glass ceiling. This describes "... a barrier that exists in some organizations that keep women from advancing to top management position." For instance, although 45 percent of all managers are women in today's work force, only two out of 1,000 CEOs of large businesses in the United States are women. In addition, the average pay of a woman compared to a man is less.

Even today in the 1990s, some male managers are still reluctant to promote female managers because of their own personal stereotypes.

Others fear if they did promote a woman, she may leave to have children, effecting the productivity and stability of the company. Therefore, many qualified women chose to terminate their jobs in major companies in order to start their own business.

In fact, most new U.S. businesses today are started by women. Still, some women choose to delay their career progression to have children or to return back to school for further education.

Many companies today are recognizing the importance of working toward solutions dealing with gender problems such as implementing sexual-harassment policies, maternal and paternal leave, and gender-education seminars.

Neglected? With all the talk of diversity, most of the time women are included as a diverse group, but men are often left out. Frustrated? Oftentimes, no one listens to what men have to say because they are not recognized as a part of our diverse world. Resentful? Men are used to having a dominant status in society, whether they realized it or not, and feel like they actually have to give something up for the advancement of women. Fearful? Naturally, people are afraid of the unknown or that which they do not understand, like the changing demographics of our nation.

Many men are also afraid to speak up for their own rights for fear of being labeled a chauvinist.

So how do we address these concerns? We do not know if anyone has the perfect solution, but we do have to honestly ask ourselves are the men of today really prepared for changing the world?

By neglecting to get involved in leadership positions on campus, are men walking into the "real world" at a competitive disadvantage? By choosing not to speak up about their part in diversity, are men dooming themselves to a state of exclusion? How about women, and the new roles they are pursuing, what about the decisions involving children and careers?

What about challenges and roadblocks women face based on ignorance and discrimination? How can we develop ourselves and future leaders to look at gender on more equal terms?

We need individuals to pursue new ideas and knowledge.

We need positive role models for both sexes.

We need individuals to actively learn by participating in purposeful activities.

We need individuals to take risks.

We need to applaud and encourage leadership development as well as urge others to get involved.

These are only some of the many factors that must come in to play in order to overcome gender problems.

People need to experience before they can understand.

These are the ways we can educate and prepare the young for a new, diverse and competitive global world.

SEALE

"The Black Panthers did not start out a gang club," Seale said. "We organized out of my Christian mother's home." Seale said, adding that the founding members were all college students who temporarily dropped out of school to fight for the cause.

Seale said he and 100 former party members were in the process of setting up a movie deal to tell their story. The movie will be based on his 1978 autobiography "Seize the Time."

Seale said the '60s and '70s were energetic and exciting times.

"We were idealistic. We were dreamers," Seale said.

Seale spoke of the endurance of the party and its ability to withstand massive attack by the police and FBI.

"There was a minor civil war going on here in the United States of America that people don't know about," Seale said.

After the Panthers started patrolling Oakland neighborhoods, police brutality went down 90 percent, Seale said.

"We weren't going to take any crap from any races," Seale said. "We were not a black power organization. Our motto was 'All power to all the people.'"

In the trial of the Chicago 8, Seale was charged with 16 counts of contempt of court after calling the judge a racist, fascist and bigot.

"I cussed his ass out right in the courtroom," he said. "Finally, he chained, shackled and gagged me. But I won that case and all of those trumped-up court cases."

These days, he is through with that sort of protest and on a different mission, he said.

"I'm trying to tell people they don't have to do things the way we did them in the '60s and '70s," Seale said. "I don't advocate that for youth today. But I do want to tell the story of how it happened."

After the speech, students lined up to have Seale sign his autobiography, "Seize the Time."

BIG 12 ATHLETIC DIRECTORS OPT FOR CHAMPIONSHIP

(AP) — Big 12 athletic directors voted Wednesday to play an annual championship football game beginning Dec. 7, 1996, at the Trans World Dome in St. Louis. Final approval for the contest, to be played by the winners of the North and South divisions of the upcoming league, must come from league presidents at their meeting Nov. 30-Dec. 1 in Kansas City, Mo. "If I had to guess, I'd guess they'd approve it," Kansas athletic director Bob Frederick said.

Kansas arguably nation's best

DARREN WHITLEY/Collegian

Kansas forward Raef LaFrentz tries to pass over Demond Davis. LaFrentz is one of four returning starters on the Jayhawks' roster.

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

It's been more than six months since Kansas was upset by Virginia in the Midwest Region semifinal. But the image of being dominated in the paint still lingers.

The sight of Virginia tough guy Junior Burroughs pushing the Jayhawks every which way but loose in the Cavaliers' 67-58 win against the Hawks has motivated KU to come into this season making sure that won't happen again.

"I do think we're stronger, and it came from that game," Kansas coach Roy Williams said. "The physicalness was a factor in the game. They were physically stronger than us, and when we wanted to get from spot A to spot B, they didn't let us go there."

The barometer of how much stronger KU is this season will come in the rematch against Virginia Nov. 29 at Auburn Hills, Mich.

"We're not going to approach that game any differently than any of the other games," guard Jerod Haase said. "But we definitely remember last year, and we've had that in our minds all year."

Although the increased muscle of the Hawks will help, so will the experience of guard duo of Haase and Jacque Vaughn. Vaughn, the junior point guard, was voted to the First Team All-Big 8 — but not because he can score points in handfolds. Vaughn's job is to be the leader at all times. Last season, he played more than 30 minutes in 25 games.

The scoring load from the guard spot is Haase's responsibility. In his first year at KU after transferring from California, Haase averaged 13 points a game, but he said he needed to improve his shooting from the outside (37 percent last season).

"This year, I'm hoping to get my shooting percentage up, and that will happen hopefully with better shot selection," Haase said.

With two seasoned veterans in the backcourt, Williams said he wasn't worried.

"There can't be a coach in the country that's more comfortable with his backcourt than I am," Williams said.

"A couple of years ago, with Rex (Walters) and Adonis (Jordan), we were really good back there, and although this one's not as consistent from the outside, they're much better defensively."

Team shooting was a problem spot for the Hawks in certain games last season.

"Last year's team, in certain games, really shot the ball fantastic. But some games, we couldn't throw it in the ocean from the shore," Williams said. "I hope we're a more consistent shooting team this year."

KU is deep at guard. But up front, the Hawks are a little thin. Raef LaFrentz, Scot Pollard and Sean Pearson will lead the way.

Pearson said the departure of Greg Ostertag, now with the Utah Jazz, would create some more space in the paint for the KU big men to operate.

"It's going to open things up more because Greg would step up and the other team's big guy wouldn't cover him, so we couldn't make the backdoor cuts because it was too crowded," Pearson said.

The additions of another blue-chip recruiting class will make minutes sparse. Paul Pierce, Ryan Robertson and T. J. Pugh will all play right away.

The lack of guaranteed minutes would turn most high-school seniors away from KU, something Haase has difficulty understanding.

"I have a hard time wondering why people go elsewhere," Haase said. "Obviously, I'm partial to KU. But I've experienced the greatest time of my life here, whether I play 10 minutes or 40 minutes. Winning the Big 8 championship is irreplaceable."

Kansas went 25-6 last year, including 11-3 in the conference. But the season ended on a sour note.

The preseason preparation by the Hawks might prove beneficial in April.

"Somebody wrote up on the wall, 'Everybody has the will to win, but only national champions have the will to prepare to win,'" Pearson said. "We see that every day in the locker room, and that's what we're trying to do."

The Jayhawks will be host to K-State Feb. 4 and travel to K-State Feb. 24.

Dimel finds success with K-State

K-State offensive coordinator Dana Dimel is a big Atlanta Braves fan, and he even has an autographed baseball sitting on his desk at the Vanier Football Complex.

RYAN O'HALLORAN

But it's not from Greg Maddux, Tom Glavine, Dave Justice or any of the other Atlanta stars.

"OK," Dimel said Wednesday morning. "Terry Boggs was 2-13 in 1974 for the Braves."

Terry who? We thought the only Boggs who was ever in the majors was Wade.

"Terry Boggs was my favorite pitcher because he had great stuff, but he could never get a break," Dimel said.

Unlike Boggs in '74, Dimel has experienced success. In his first season as a coordinator, No. 7 K-State is 9-1 heading into Saturday's season finale against Colorado. And the offense, which was so-so during the first half of the season, has hit stride, scoring 41, 49 and 49 points since the Nebraska debacle.

"A lot of it is because of the maturity of Matt (Miller)," Dimel said.

"Matt was like a fifth-year freshman, and that's no longer the case. All of the experience he has garnered has helped him quite a bit."

"That's the major reason the offense is doing so well."

After Del Miller left to become coach at Southwest Missouri State, Dimel, who played here from 1984-86 and has been a full-time coach since 1989, got the call. Dimel coordinated the running game last year, and this season, Ron Hudson was brought in from Ohio State to coordinate the passing game with Coach Bill Snyder.

So the transition hasn't been that difficult. "For him to become our coordinator, it's been a natural evolution that has taken place," Snyder said. "He's gone through the system."

"We didn't miss a beat," Dimel agreed his experience with the system helped.

"I've been in the system and worked my way up, and the responsibilities each year have grown and this year for me. It's just more organizational things," Dimel said. "The X's and O's part really hasn't changed."

On any given Saturday, most fans just see Snyder with the headset, giving the play to whoever is entering the game. But in 45 seconds between each play, the round table of Snyder, Dimel and Hudson confer.

But the boss makes the final decision. "The passing game is between Coach Hudson and Coach Snyder, and I'm responsible for coordinating all of the running plays and all of the pass protection," Dimel said.

"As far as calling the plays goes, all of the running game I call, and Coach Snyder calls all of the pass plays with Coach Hudson. I'm throwing out running recommendations and run calls, and Ron's throwing out recommendations for Coach, and Coach is the final guy and makes the decision on what he wants to see on the field."

But not all of the plays are called by the coaching staff. During the past month, Miller has checked off accurately on several occasions, and in other instances, doesn't have a play brought in from the huddle, just a suggestion of what to look for.

"What we try to do during the week is tell Matt, 'OK, here's what you want to get into if they give you this,'" Dimel explained. "And a lot of times, we put him up to the line of scrimmage and give him a check with me. He doesn't have a play, but he's got preconceived thoughts, and he looks the formation over and calls the play."

In their first year at their respective positions, Dimel and Hudson have seen K-State go from one-dimensional last season to a more balanced attack.

"What Matt has brought to our offense is a balance between the run and pass," Dimel said. "With Chad (May), we were primarily a throwing team."

"What has helped Matt so much is that people are preparing to stop our running game, so now that's opened up the play-action pass and the passing game a little more."

The K-State coaching staff has shown that delegating authority is the way to go. Jim Leavitt and Bob Stoops are co-defensive coordinators. Dimel and Hudson, along with Snyder, split up the offense.

But that doesn't mean they get to go home early. "I don't get too much sleep now because we just had a baby boy four weeks ago, too, so I've got from 8:30 in the morning to 12:30 to 1 at night," Dimel said.

The excitement of this record-breaking season hasn't diminished though.

"It's really exciting but we're working so hard, and I keep telling my wife that after this week, we'll sit back and enjoy it," Dimel said.

"But right now, it's all business."

OSU solid without Big Country

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

In practice these days, Oklahoma State junior guard-forward Chianti Roberts can roam freely into the lane.

"It's kind of weird," Roberts said. "When I drive to the basket in practice now, I don't have to worry about getting knocked down."

For the first time in four seasons, Bryant Reeves won't be stalking the lane and swatting shots and bodies out of the way. But even though the player who led them to the Final Four last season is playing professionally in Vancouver and the player who hit 146 three-pointers (Randy Rutherford) is also gone, that doesn't mean the Cowboys (27-10, 10-4) are the runts in the Big 8.

Although Coach Eddie Sutton planned on the loss of Reeves, the departures of Ben Baum (who transferred to New Mexico) and John Nelson caught the staff by surprise.

Nelson, a six-foot-11 sophomore who was to fill Big Country's spot in the lineup, averaged three points a game. But during the summer, Baum told Sutton he'd had enough of college basketball.

"Hopefully, he'll come to his senses and decide he needs to come back and play basketball because he has enough talent to be a great player someday," Sutton said.

Roberts said Nelson didn't have the drive every night to play in the Big 8.

"He wasn't as mentally ready to play at the Division I level, and you need to be," Roberts said. "He came from a situation where he wasn't the big fish in the little pond — he was the only fish. And then he gets here, and he was like algae."

Without Nelson, the role of newcomer

Jerome Lambert is amplified. As a junior with Baylor two years ago, the 6' 8" Lambert averaged 19 points and 15 rebounds.

"Lambert's a good player," Sutton said. "He's one of those guys that has a great sense for the ball. There's just some guys who have a sense of where to go when the ball comes off the glass."

So far in the pre-season, Lambert has shown his teammates he's a big-time rebounder — and why he's the consensus pick for Big 8 Newcomer of the Year.

"You don't realize how rebounders have to react to the ball," Roberts said. "Jerome is consistently moving, and I've never seen a guy with a hunger for the ball like his. I can see where those 15 rebounds a game come from."

Offensively this season, Sutton said, the Cowboys might run a little more with point guard Andre Owens leading the charge, but Roberts said he isn't so sure.

"It would be a really hard transition for us," Roberts said. "I think it'll pretty much be the same. Sutton has been doing this a long time, and old habits die hard."

After last season, when OSU had the inside game covered with Reeves and the outside covered with Rutherford, the Cowboys will play this year with what they have.

"With every ball club, you just have to take what you have and build on the strengths and try to disguise the weaknesses on the team," Sutton said. "And without a big guy like Bryant, this team as a different personality."

The Cowboys visit K-State Jan. 24 and are host to the Wildcats Feb. 10.

Nebraska's guards provide depth

Chris May
staff reporter

Football isn't the only sport in the Cornhusker state these days. Nebraska fans can also look forward to the basketball season.

The Huskers are picked to finish third in the Big 8 preseason poll after finishing seventh last season.

"Last season sucked," Coach Danny Nee said. "I don't want to talk about last year — I want to talk about this year."

The Huskers are returning four starters and four letter winners and are bringing in six newcomers.

Senior guard Eric Strickland said he was disappointed in the performance of last year's team.

"No one took the initiative to stop the bleeding," Strickland said. "We didn't have any leadership."

Strickland said he took matters into his own hands this summer, and, he said, he can play with anybody.

"I really think I could play with anybody in the nation," Strickland said.

Putting on five pounds and working out constantly has made Strickland quicker, he said.

"People are going to have a hard time defending me," Strickland said.

Senior guard Jaron Boone said he thought of his role with the team a little differently.

"I'll just help the team with all of the little things," Boone said.

Last year, there wasn't enough meat and size in the lineup. And that meant the team couldn't control the boxes, Nee said.

Five of the six newcomers on the Husker roster are more than 200 pounds.

The one who isn't, freshman guard Tyrone Lue, makes up for it in other ways.

"He's quick and fast, and he's a playmaker. He knows what to do in certain situations, and that's what will make this team fun to watch this season," Strickland said.

Another key newcomer to the Husker lineup is junior transfer forward Bernard Garner.

Garner transferred to Nebraska from Western Nebraska Community College in Scottsbluff. While at the junior college, Garner earned the national junior college player of the year award. He is expected to be a power forward, Nee said.

Nee said he was proud of the way Garner and the rest of the team have come together.

"They are the most focused I have ever seen them," Nee said.

Nee said senior leadership is a key and a must with this team.

"We must win those close games," Nee said.

Last year, the Huskers lost quite a few close games, including a six-point loss to Penn State in the second round of the NIT in Lincoln. They also lost 10 of their last 14 games in regular-season play.

But the Cornhuskers, who are celebrating their 100th year of basketball, are trying to step up their level of play in the final year of the Big 8. The Huskers start the season on Nov. 24 when the team plays Toledo in the Big Island Invitational in Hilo, Hawaii.

The Cornhuskers will be host to K-State Jan. 31 and visit the Cats March 3.

► VOLLEYBALL TEAM FALLS TO ORAL ROBERTS UNIVERSITY IN 3 GAMES

K-State dropped its last non-conference match of the semester last night, falling in three games at Oral Roberts University.

The Wildcats hit only .216 in the first game with just 11 kills, losing 15-11. The Cats' best hitting game was the second, when they hit .219 before losing 15-10. K-State managed only nine kills in a .091 performance in the final game, falling 15-7.

Senior Jill Dugan led the offense with 12 kills, hitting .333. Junior Yolanda "Toie" Young recorded seven kills, and junior Kate DeClerk had five. Sophomore Devon Ryning recorded 21 assists.

Defensively, sophomore Val Phillips led the way with five digs.

The Cats' next match will be Saturday night at Colorado.

Coach Jim Moore was unavailable for comment.

► MEN'S GOLF TEAM FINISHES FINAL TOURNAMENT OF FALL SEASON

The K-State men's golf team finished final-round action Tuesday in the University of Texas-Arlington's United Sports Technologies Invitational Golf Tournament at the Fossil Creek Golf Course in Fort Worth, Texas. The tournament was the team's last of the semester.

The Wildcats finished in sixth place after shooting 310-300-299-909 for the tournament. Texas Wesleyan led the field with a score of 873, followed by host Texas-Arlington and the junior varsity squad from the University of New Mexico, which tied with 902.

Leading the way for the Cats was Troy Haltermann, who tied for 12th with a score of 224. Scott Hovis and Chad Buckridge tied for 21st, Jason Losch tied for 36th, and Andy King placed 63rd.

LaVerne Pavlinac might be getting out of prison soon. She told police in Oregon five years ago that she and her boyfriend had murdered a woman. She made the lie up in an attempt to break off their relationship. She succeeded — both of them were sentenced to life in prison. Police have apprehended someone who they believe is the true murderer, and the two of them might get released. "I'm kind of upset with the way my case wasn't investigated," she said. "They just took my word for it and didn't try to find anything else." The poor thing. About the only thing worse than what happened to her would be going to prison for murder because your girlfriend wants to dump you.

"The only person that didn't ask the ad not run was Clinton himself," Brazilian lingerie designer Duloren said. The proposed ad was of a photograph of Hillary Clinton in a skirt. The photograph was shot at an angle that revealed the panties she was wearing underneath. A spokesperson for the advertising agency said the ad was supposed to say daring women didn't mind if their panties were seen. The ad was pulled at Duloren's request, but it's still not clear why President Clinton didn't object. Perhaps Duloren should seek out a crotch shot of Jennifer Flowers.

Weekend Addicted to

F.R.I.E.N.D.S

It is around 7 p.m. Thursday. You start to hear the familiar theme song from your favorite TV show. Everything else in your world stops. It's time for NBC's hit show, "Friends."

Many houses, apartments and residence hall rooms in Manhattan had their televisions tuned to "Friends" last Thursday. Many students watch "Friends" and other popular shows. They find the shows easy to relate to their own lives.

People were packed around the television Thursday night at the Kappa Kappa Gamma house. "Shhh" was the only sound in the room besides what was coming from the television.

"It's a good study break. It's fun to have so many girls glued to one TV set. It's fun to watch everybody," Amy Betz, sophomore in marketing, said.

Next door, the scene at the Alpha Xi Delta house was much the same. As the show progressed, more girls entered the room and started pulling their chairs closer to the television.

"It makes me laugh the most out of everything on television," said Keri McCann, senior in family life and community service.

Diane Gordon, sophomore in wildlife biology, said she started watching "Friends" last year.

"It's addictive. You have to watch it to see what happens to everybody. It's funnier than anything," Gordon said.

College students have a sense of attachment to shows like this. They can relate to the characters because they share the same values, Scott Frey, associate professor in sociology, said.

"People watch certain sorts of things to find who they are and confirmations of value structures," Frey said. "People are looking for a confirmation of who they are."

Another reason college students relate to these shows is that the characters are about the same age.

"Part of the reason I watch it is because they're close to our age and the guys are cute. It has a storyline you can relate to," said Carrie Collett, sophomore in secondary education.

Shows like "Friends" also can provide students an escape from the stress of everyday life.

"It's about fake life and something you might want to have one of these days," Amy Wymer, freshman in art education, said.

And that escape is provided to students with a little bit of fantasy.

"They find meaning in other peoples' lives as a form of fantasy," Frey said.

These shows can be addictive. Some will have their favorite shows taped if they have to miss it.

"Each episode always makes you want to watch the next one to know what's really going on," said Jessica Jones, freshman in elementary education.

Getting wrapped up in shows like this is not a serious problem for most people. However, it is a problem for those who can't miss a show.

"Anyone that becomes totally wrapped up in a fantasy — it could be a problem," Frey said.

Jennifer Redetzke, sophomore in elementary education, said after the conclusion of "Friends" at the Kappa house, that the show was addictive.

Of course, it doesn't hurt that the main characters are attractive.

"The guys are just too perfect to be true," said Redetzke.

But it's not just women who watch these shows and find the characters attractive.

Brent Nelson, sophomore in business, had only one reason why he watches "Friends."

"Jennifer Aniston," he said.

"It's addictive. You watch to see what happens to everybody," Diane Gordon, sophomore in wildlife biology, said.

WETLANDS

Legislation might upset delicate Kansas habitats

As much as 60 to 75 percent of U.S. and Kansas protected wetlands could be affected by a proposed redefinition of wetlands.

Three pieces of legislation being considered could significantly weaken federal wetlands protection, said Douglas Inkey, wetland team leader for the National Wildlife Federation.

Proposed conservation reform options could weaken the wetland protections under the Swampbuster program, which restricts farmers from converting wetlands for agricultural production.

Other House and Senate legislation would rewrite a section of the Clean Water Act, under which wetlands are regulated.

"These bills contain definitions that are politically motivated and arbitrary in redefining wetlands," Inkey said.

A study conducted by the Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers found that if enacted, these bills would exempt 60 to 75 percent of natural wetlands from protection, Inkey said.

"The redefinition is actually against what was said by the National Academy of Science study, which said that wetlands should be defined in biological terms, not political terms," said Spencer Tomb, associate professor in the Division of Biology and vice president of the Kansas Wildlife Federation.

He said people wanted to think that a wetland is a place where if you stomp, it would make a splash. However, many wetlands are dry for most of the year.

David Rintoul, associate professor in the Division of Biology, said writing a definition of wetlands was required, but biology and legislation have an unresolvable conflict.

"People like things to be black and white, but biology doesn't work that way," he said.

In Kansas, there are several types of wetlands. Forested wetlands often occur around rivers, and shallow wetland marshes have standing water for extended periods. Other wetlands might be wet for only a few days a year.

"Wetlands that are dry part of the year are still very important in the water cycle," Tomb said.

Wetlands that are less than an acre in size are also threatened. About 80 percent of these "prairie potholes" are less than an acre, and it is these small wetlands that are important as breeding grounds for waterfowl, according to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Services.

Wetlands also affect water quality by cleansing polluted water. They do this by helping filter out impurities before surface water makes its way into rivers or ground water supplies.

"If you have wetlands and water drains to the wetlands, it is slowed down, and silt, sediments and nutrients settle out. The volume of water that gets to a stream is initially lowered. This may help reduce flooding," said Bill Wehmuller, a specialist with the Natural Resource Conservation Service.

Tomb said wetlands had tremendous value in terms of the water cycle.

"If we continue to drain wetlands, we are going to have increasing problems with ground-water recharge and water cleansing," he said.

Kansas is already ranked 50th among the states in water quality, he said.

Jan Garton, a Manhattan environmental activist, said wetlands were also important to flood control.

"The flood of '93 was a good example of what happens when you remove wetlands," he said. "If the riparian and wetland areas associated with rivers in Kansas had been left in place, damages would have been reduced."

Another role wetlands play is that of home to many species of plants and animals.

Kansas is an important stop for migrating birds, and many of the species that depend on the wetlands are endangered.

"To wildlife, they are a tremendous resource," Garton said. "If we lose them, we are not replacing them with any other type of home, so whoever depends on them is out of luck."

Tomb said that in some migratory species of birds, every single member of those species stop at certain wetlands.

"Without those wetlands, it is doubtful that those species will survive," he said.

Garton said people have trouble seeing the direct cause and effect of destroying nature.

"It is a cumulative impact, just like global warming or the ozone layer," she said. "The differences are felt gradually."

Fathead Minnow

Minnows live in prairie marshes and streams. In summer heat, the minnows either become trapped in pools, where they are easy prey, or die from lack of oxygen. Minnows eat mosquito larvae. Minnows are prey to turtles, raccoons and birds.

American Avocet

One of the largest shorebirds, the American Avocet uses its bill to find aquatic insects in shallow water.

What are wetlands?

Land that most local criteria have considered a wetland by the government.

- Land must be capable of supporting water plants.
- Plants that normally live in wet areas, such as yellow reeds, must be present.
- The land must pond for seven consecutive days or must be saturated within 12 inches of the topsoil every two to three years.

What the bill proposes

Senate and House bills would keep laws intact with the following changes:

- Anything less than an acre would not be considered a wetland.
- Wetlands converted to farmland before the signing of the 1985 Farm Bill can be farmed without penalties.
- Farmers who do not knowingly convert wetlands to farmland will not be penalized.

Landowners want more control of their farmland

Farmers and landowners want the government to keep off their land, wetland or not.

"We in agriculture want the freedom to plant what we want on the farm, and in exchange for the government doing less for the farmers, they also need to get government agencies out of our lives," said Paul Fleener, director of public affairs for Kansas Farm Bureau in Manhattan.

Legislation that was passed by the House Agriculture Subcommittee and that is being considered by the Senate agriculture subcommittee could ease regulations on the use of wetlands for farming.

Anything less than an acre would not be considered a wetland. Any wetland converted to farmland before the signing of the 1985 Farm Bill could still be farmed without penalties.

Farmers who do not knowingly convert wetlands to farmland would not be penalized.

Farmers and landowners do not want to be forced to do something because of the government, Kevin Religa, Riley County district conservationist, said.

"They're kind of getting burned out on government regulation," Religa said. "Most of the farmers want to do the right thing. They just don't like the government coming in and telling them what to do. Overall, the farmers are pretty conservation-minded."

Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., chairs the House Agriculture Committee that worked on the bill regulating wetland farming.

Bill Fuller, associate director of public affairs for Kansas Farm Bureau, said many in agriculture said the government definition of wetlands is too broad.

"The majority are supportive of presently what we call real wetlands, an area with standing water and hydrophytic plants," he said, "but sometimes the overenthusiastic bureaucracy wants to designate land that is being farmed today as wetlands."

Fuller said the definition was a result of too many agencies being involved in regulation.

The U.S. Corps of Engineers and the Soil Conservation Service are the primary agencies operating wetland programs.

In the past, as many as six agencies have played a part in forming various definitions.

"There have just been too many agencies involved in designating what is a wetland," Fuller said.

If deregulation passes, the definition of a wetland will change, and less land will be classified as wetlands.

Farmers are going to have the opportunity to farm without someone telling them they're doing something wrong, Fleener said.

Fuller said some wetlands were nothing more than a mud-hole in a milo field.

Deregulation would also save the government money, Fleener said.

"You don't need so many people if you don't need people watching over the shoulder of every farmer," he said.

Pat Abel, soil scientist for Natural Resources Conservation Service said many farmers were upset with the wetland programs because they did not understand all of them.

"There is a misconception that you can't farm wetlands. You can — it just has to be under natural conditions," Abel said.

WEB SITE REVIEWS

They're not all fun, but there are some cool web pages here

Darin Sleefkes
contributing writer

Due to the letters I have received about various home pages, this week is reader's choice week.

St. Petersburg Times Online
(<http://www.times-st-pete.fl.us/>)
The St. Petersburg Times is an excellent on-line newspaper that deserves viewing. It provides good national news coverage and great coverage for Florida for people from that semitropical state.
The best feature of this page is the virtual touring menu. For people who don't plan to visit the "The Treasure of the Czars" exhibit in Topeka, or would like to get a preview, this page is for you.
Every important stop on the tour has its own pictures and description on the well-designed home page. A surfer can easily spend hours browsing just this section of the Times and not get bored or see the same thing twice.
It even includes an interactive time line with a short biography of each Czar of Russia from the 1600s to 1917. There is even a crash course in Russian and recommendations for books.

Yitzhak Rabin Condolence Page
(<http://www.netking.com/index.html>)
I would also like to highly recommend the Yitzhak Rabin Condolence Page. This is a touching page in the memory of the recently fallen leader of the Israel State.
Surfers can send the Rabin family and the state of Israel condolences with a short and simple form that takes about 30 seconds to fill out. It also has a section, when clicked upon, takes the user to a page of candles where one is added each time the page is viewed.
The speeches made by various world leaders at the Rabin Memorial service can also be heard. It also includes a photo gallery of the late prime minister.

KKSU Online
(<http://www.aznet.ksu.edu/depl/kcom/kksu/welcome.htm>)
KKSU AM-580, one of the nation's pioneer stations, is pioneering the web with a page that makes KKSU much easier to understand.
The big problem with educational radio is nobody ever knows what's on it, so listeners avoid the station. KKSU has answered that with on-line, daily programming of all of its shows that is accessible with a wave of the mouse.
A good history of the station is included and is well worth reading. Information about the staff is also included without pictures, unfortunately.
This is not a bad site, but it still needs some construction.

CES Online
(<http://www.ksu.edu/ces/ces.html>)
The Career and Employment services in Holtz Hall has done good work at making the mumbo jumbo of finding jobs and internships a lot easier with its home page.
Everything Holtz does is online to help students and alumni on job searches. Not only are the job searches online, but information of the employers visiting K-State are also at your fingertips.

► BLUE KEY

K-State alumna defines basis of leadership

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

Ordinary people can be leaders regardless of money, power or looks, Mary McDonald Hewson said Wednesday.

Hewson delivered her speech, "Leading By Doing, Ordinary People Doing Extraordinary Things," as part of Leadership Week '95.

"Perceive a need, pursue that subject, act upon it and accomplish your goal," she said, defining leadership.

"With that, you must have desire. Enclosed in desire have to be the qualities of reliability, recognition and integrity," Hewson said.

Above all, people must trust their leaders, Hewson said.

"You must have basic trust of the people you work with, because if they don't trust you, they won't choose you," she said.

Hewson, who has been named in Who's Who of American Women, is a K-State graduate, active KSU Alumni Association member and teacher.

She encouraged students to look through the campus directory and find an organization to get involved with.

"I don't care where you are. You can help someone. You can be leader," Hewson said.

Blue Key and leaders have made K-State what it is, she said after her speech.

"Every building on this campus has the history of some student group that made that building important," she said.

Sarah Adams, junior in pre-nursing, said the speech was inspiring.

"I thought it was neat how she expressed how ordinary she was and that you don't need to be born a leader with money or power," Adams said.

► LEADERSHIP WEEK

Recipe for being a good leader: you must check your ego

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

When given a choice between show or tell, silence is golden, a speaker for Leadership Week '95 said Wednesday afternoon.

"When you do finally speak, you will have a greater impact," said Patty Clark, chairwoman of the KSU Alumni Association.

Clark, who is a 1974 animal science graduate from K-State, is involved in more than 20 organizations and has leadership roles in 13 of them.

Her main focus in leadership is women's awareness and the agriculture industry.

To be a good leader, you must check your ego, Clark said.

"If you wake up impressed with yourself, you ain't been asleep yet," she said.

"You need to take your job very seriously, but don't take yourself seriously. That doesn't mean be a cut up, but don't make yourself the center of attention," Clark said.

A good leader should also look for long-term answers, not just bandages, Clark said.

If you look out over the ocean, and it's placid, calm and smooth, a typhoon is coming.

When you are working in an organization there is always upheaval, she said.

"It's human nature," Clark said. "It's always crisis management when you're working with people."

Clark said women have made great strides in leadership since her days at K-State.

"When I started in agriculture, I was the only female walking the halls in Weber. It has changed tremendously," Clark said.

Deadra Hornung, junior in early childhood education, said after listening to Clark's speech, she plans to become more involved in leadership.

"I wrote down how I felt after her speech, and I put down one word — charisma," she said.

Renee Arnett, junior in speech pathology, said she was in awe.

"She's a very powerful person," Arnett said. "I'm in a leadership position, and I've never felt so motivated."

► TREATMENT

Eating disorders have recognizable symptoms

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

About 80 students were diagnosed and treated for eating disorders by Lafene Health Center last school year, Dorothy Farrand, psychologist at Lafene, said.

"I do think it's a serious problem because it affects many aspects of a person's life in terms of their self-esteem, as well as their relationships with other people and family," Farrand said.

Reita Currie, health educator at Lafene, said there was education about eating disorders on college campuses, but there could never be enough.

"I think we can always get more education out there to get in it front of people so they don't ignore it," Currie said.

The three most common eating disorders are anorexia nervosa, bulimia and compulsive overeating, according to a pamphlet distributed by Lafene.

The pamphlet also stated the typical anorexic is thin and afraid to gain weight. Anorexics may have dry skin, cold hands and feet, general weakness, constipation, digestive problems, insomnia and loss of menstrual periods.

If the weight loss of anorexics continues for too long, people can also experience stress fractures, severe chemical imbalances and weaknesses of the heart muscle that can lead to death.

Bulimia, according to the pamphlet, causes dehydration, constipation and digestive disorders, severe dental problems and muscle weakness. If bulimia goes too far, it can also cause ulcers and life-threatening heart irregularities.

Currie said many people did not consider overeating to be a disorder, but the problem can be just as dangerous as anorexia and bulimia.

Compulsive overeating resulting in obesity causes shortness of breath, high blood pressure and joint problems.

"Previously, overeating was seen as a separate issue, and it was not seen as a disorder as such," Farrand said.

Currie said people who want to learn more about eating disorders should read "The Body Betrayed. Women, Eating Disorders and Treatment" by Kathryn J. Zebbre.

Lafene also distributes pamphlets about eating disorders in its offices and hallways, Currie said. Nothing, however, is a good substitute for seeking help from Lafene, she said.

a position of authority over students. Faculty can tell students they have a problem that is affecting their health and academic performance.

She said a faculty member should then offer to walk the student to Lafene, where someone is always on duty to help.

The panel said symptoms of anorexia and bulimia include cavities, puffiness in face from dehydration, redness on knuckles, enlargement of salivary glands and warm clothing worn on warm days. Emotional symptoms include isolation, low self-esteem, depression and fatigue.

Bulemics do not have to eat a large amount of food before inducing vomiting, Burke said.

"It doesn't have to be a large amount of food. It can be one cookie, and the guilt is there, and you want to get rid of it," Burke said.

Farrand said most disorders start with an innocent diet and escalate into a problem.

Martin said about 12 percent of anorexia cases result in death and many of the deaths are suicides.

Dianna Schalles, dietitian for Lafene, said the longer a person avoids treatment for eating disorders, the better their chances are for death.

Farrand said about one half of the people who come to Lafene for help do not admit that they have an eating disorder.

Many anorexics come from families with mothers who are over-involved in their daughter's weight and have issues about their own weight. Anorexics also often have fathers who are not emotionally attached to their children and put a lot of stress on success in school and in life, she said.

WETLANDS

Once someone sits down and has a chance to explain it to farmers face-to-face, they understand much better, he said.

If the deregulation does not pass, officials said it will not kill the American farmer.

"If they farm it right now, they can continue to farm it, but they just can't convert anymore wetlands to farmland," Religa said. "In Riley County, if the land wasn't already drained, they're probably not going to do it now anyway because it would cost too much money."

Abel said farmers would also not be hurt monetarily if the bill failed.

"I can't think of one case that would really affect anyone money-wise," Abel said. "The overall effect to the farmer would be minimal, if any."

Abel said farmers and landowners care about the environment and want to keep wetlands.

"Overall, the farmers are real concerned with preserving the wetland areas but think some of the smaller areas need to be deregulated," Abel said.

Fleener said farmers were as concerned about the environment as anyone.

"Farmers aren't going to go out and put on three times the amount of pesticide they need," Fleener said. "Farmers drink the water that is under their land, too."

Are you at risk for diabetes? Could you already have diabetes and not know it? Take the Test. Know the Score.

Write in the points next to each statement that is true for you.
If a statement is not true for you, put a zero.
Then add up your total score.

- I have been experiencing one or more of the following symptoms on a regular basis:

Scoring 3-5 points:

If you scored 3-5 points, you probably are at low risk for diabetes. But don't just forget about it. Especially if you're over 40, overweight, or of Black, Hispanic, or Native American Indian descent.

What to do about it:

Be sure you know the symptoms of diabetes. If you experience any of them, contact your doctor for further testing.

Scoring over 5 points:

If you scored over 5 points, you may be at high risk for diabetes. You even may already have diabetes.

What to do about it:

See your doctor promptly. Find out if you have diabetes. Even if you don't have diabetes, know the symptoms. If you experience any of them in the future, you should see your doctor immediately.

The American Diabetes Association urges all pregnant women to be tested for diabetes between the 24th-28th weeks of pregnancy.

This test is meant to educate and make you aware of the serious risks of diabetes. Only a medical doctor can determine if you do have diabetes.

A COLLEGIAN
SPECIAL SECTION

Party planning

It's easy to throw a holiday party with a K-State theme by Sara Smith

It just wouldn't be Christmas at K-State without a party.

Throwing a Christmas party with a K-State theme is easier than it sounds — incorporating drinks and decorations with a dash of purple is all it takes.

Scott Schneider, owner of Nespor's Wine and Spirits, said most purple drinks are based on a few key ingredients — just like Purple Passion.

"Things like that are great, like juice and vodka, to taste," Schneider said.

Tom Wyatt, employee of Wilkinson's Liquor Store, said the Purple Mask was one drink students could make for a purple-tinged drink.

The Purple Mask is made of grape juice, vodka and creme de cocoa, shaken with ice and served in a cocktail glass.

Wyatt, a junior in fisheries biology, said to be sure to use white creme de cocoa to make sure the drink comes out purple. He said the drink could be prepared in advance in larger quantities.

"Just chill a gallon of each, and you're good to go," he said.

Scott Green, employee of Dean Liquor in Aggieville and a fifth-year senior in business management, said Purple Hooter shots are always popular as a K-State drink.

Schneider said Purple Passion, or a drink just like it, is something anyone can make with grain alcohol or vodka and grape juice.

"Purple Passion — that's just something somebody concocted," he said.

Schneider said there aren't many purple liqueurs so mixing with grape juice would be the way to get most purple-colored party drinks.

A simple purple drink for those on a budget can be made with grape juice concentrate, vodka and Everclear.

Having a Wildcat holiday party would also include incorporating purple into the decor. Purple Christmas lights, streamers, garland and ornaments are a good way to go.

"We have purple Christmas lights if they want to get real K-State and real festive," Taylor said.

Whether the halls are decked with purple, throwing a good holiday party is not an easy job. Deciding what to serve, who to invite and how to decorate can keep hosts from having a good time themselves. It's important not to overdo it, beginning with invitations.

Rhonda Taylor, personnel manager of The Palace in Aggieville, said although you can buy invitations already made, it can be more fun to make them yourself.

"We carry a lot of different stationery, rubber stamps and stickers if students want to make their own invitations. I do that a lot of myself," she said.

Stacey Williams, assistant manager of Confetti's in Aggieville, said students try to have fun when planning a party.

"We sell confetti to put in invitations. That seems to be pretty popular around here,"

Williams said.

Decorating for a holiday party could get expensive, but setting the right holiday mood is important.

Even if there isn't enough room for a full-sized Christmas tree, there are smaller trees that will fit in the corner of any cramped apartment or room in the residence halls.

"We've got one that could go in a dorm room and the little ornaments for them," said Walt Pesaresi, owner of Mr. P's Party Outlet.

Even without a tree, party hosts can set the mood with streamers, garland, lights and other added touches.

"I would do, if they want to get into the holiday thing, I would burn candles or put out some holiday potpourri," Taylor said.

Pesaresi said candles were a good way to get a good holiday environment, especially unique candles in the shape of snowballs and other holiday themes.

"We sell a lot of candles to college kids," he said.

Taylor said most people tend to stick to decorating with traditional colors for holiday parties.

"Red and green are probably the top two colors. We do some gold and silver. Those are probably the top four colors for Christmas parties," Taylor said.

Taylor said it was possible to dress up an apartment or house without spending too much money.

"We do garlands around the trees and windows, and a lot of students do that," she said.

Williams said she agreed.

"Garlands fill up a lot of space, and balloons take up space, too. All that stuff's not very expensive," she said.

Of course, once guests are inside a festive atmosphere, you'll probably have to feed them.

Luke Willis, head houseman at Bockers II Catering, said although caterers do a lot of business for fraternity and sorority parties around Christmastime, most students can't afford a fully catered event.

"We do a lot of bars, and then we give them chips, pretzels, popcorn," he said.

Willis said the key to feeding a party of friends was keeping it simple.

"I would try to stay away from expensive liquor and expensive foods," Willis said.

Willis also said he recommended keeping the number of guests reasonable and maybe even having a Christmas party be a pot luck.

"The smaller the party, that's where everyone gets involved," he said.

Willis said it was important not to go overboard on buying

Proper packaging

When sending packages through the mail, it is important to wrap them properly so they arrive safely. Start with a strong cardboard box and follow these tips:

Use strong filament tape to seal the package instead of string, which can snag and break.

Styrofoam peanuts, bubble wrap or other packaging materials make the package sturdy. Glass items should be wrapped individually and placed two inches away from the edge of the box.

Mark the complete address and return address including zip codes on the outside and inside of the package. Don't use markers unless they are waterproof.

Send packages early. Thanksgiving is a good time to send packages to avoid the Christmas rush.

Now is the time to send mail packages

Sara Edwards
staff reporter

Coconuts from Hawaii with just a stamp and the address are some of the many strange things Postmaster Marvin Roth has seen come through the mail.

To ensure that holiday packages come through the mail unscathed, it is important to ship them properly.

It is important to make sure the packages sent are sturdy enough to make it through the mail.

"If you were to stand over it with a bowling ball and drop it, would it survive?" Roth said.

Roth recommends using a rigid, sturdy cardboard box. Shoeboxes are too weak.

Strong filament tape should be used to keep the package sealed. String should not be used because it can snag on things, Roth said.

Inside the box, Styrofoam peanuts, bubble wrap or other packaging materials can be used to make the package more sturdy. Crystal and china should be wrapped individually, said Ms. Jackson, a customer-service representative with the United Parcel service.

"Call the 1-800 number for UPS, and we'll tell how to pack it," Jackson said.

Glass should be two inches away from the edge of the box, Cheryl Smith, owner of Mail Boxes Etc., said.

Mail Boxes Etc. will package what is being shipped for the customer.

"We charge for the box and packaging materials we would use," Smith said.

Smith and Roth both stressed addressing and labeling boxes properly. The complete address, including the zip code, should be clearly marked on the outside of the package, and the return address should also be included.

Jackson said post office box addresses would slow down delivery. She also said not to write on the outside of the box with a magic marker in case the package gets wet.

Jackson and Roth also said to put the address on the inside of the package as a backup. If something happens to the outside, the workers will open up the box and look for an address. If they find an address, they will send the package on its way.

"If something should happen that we can't read the address, someone will open it," Roth said.

Jackson also said to get a tracking number in case the package is misplaced or lost.

To avoid the Christmas rush, ship packages early. Thanksgiving is a good time to start shipping packages.

"Right after Thanksgiving would be best," said Cindy Wahl, customer service manager at Dillons. "Anytime in the last two weeks, they're risking it."

Roth said early December was the time packages in the United States should be shipped. Packages for the military should be shipped by Dec. 1.

It is almost too late for overseas packages. They should have been shipped in the first part of November, Roth said.

The post office offers Express Mail, Priority Mail and Parcel Post, depending on the time the package has to be shipped. Prices are determined by the weight of the package.

Express Mail is next-day delivery. It costs $15 to ship a package weighing between 8 ounces and 2 pounds.

"As we get closer to Christmas, people start using that service so their gifts won't be late," Roth said.

Priority Mail takes from two to three days nationwide. The cost is $3 to ship up to two pounds. Parcel Post takes between five to seven days. The cost is determined by the weight of the package and the distance it has to travel.

The cost of packages delivered through the UPS also depends on the weight and the distance it is going.

The Manhattan Post Office is at 500 Leavenworth St. A shipping center for the UPS is at 1133 Hays Drive. Dillon Stores have both post office and UPS shipping available.

Mail Boxes Etc., 1228 Westloop, ships through UPS and the post office.

HOLIDAY PARAPHERNALIA

Don't forget the Christmas cards

Rachelle Harkness
staff reporter

A present for mom, a Christmas mat for the front door, Christmas cards, Christmas cards and maybe just one more box of Christmas cards.

When the holidays approach, shopping lists can go on forever. But, you can't forget that one essential item — Christmas cards.

Every year, the same problem comes up.

Do you still send your third cousin who lives in South Carolina and whom you only see at weddings and funerals a Christmas greeting? And what about your ninth-grade English teacher you've been sending a card to for so many years? Is it finally time to cut her off?

"Christmas time is a perfect opportunity to reopen communication lines between relatives who live far away and friends you don't see very often," Tina Tickles, senior in hotel and restaurant management said.

On the other hand, some people only find it necessary to send cards to close relatives and friends.

"I send out cards every year, but I usually only send them to people I talk to on a regular basis," Kjersten Marts, senior in lifespan development and family studies, said.

Having the time to fill out a lot of cards during the busiest season of the year also builds a burden. Many people resort to writing a general letter about what the family is doing, about where they have moved, etc. Then, they make copies to send out with the greeting.

"My mom writes a letter every year about what all of us are doing and makes copies to send out. It's just easier that way, and it keeps relatives and family friends informed about what we're doing," Kelly Runnfeldt, senior in apparel and textile marketing, said.

With cards rarely costing less than $1 and stamps priced at 32 cents, ideas of how to save money has everyone thinking.

Sharon Warner, elementary education teacher from Wichita, said her students are making cards out of brown paper sacks this year.

"After they have chosen a shape to cut out, they can add a little color with sponge paint. They usually like to add a personal message on the card after the paint dries," she said.

Ben Franklin's has numerous creative ideas for making personalized cards. Dennis Marten, owner and manager, said people are buying blank cards and using rubber stamps to decorate. They have samples available for ideas.

"You can also make your own paper. We sell the pulp and binder separately. Then, you put it in the blender. People have been getting pretty creative with adding potpourri scents or colors to the paper," Marten said.

You have 20 people to get holiday gifts for but only two dollars in your checking account.

It's time to get creative. Many students have found that making gifts is cheaper and more personal. Some people are good at sewing or another skill that can translate into gifts for loved ones.

"My sister-in-law always makes me things. She's just amazing — she made me a pull-over fleece jacket," said Doug LaMunyon, junior in elementary education and pre-law. "What's nice about it is that I know it takes a lot of her time to do this, and she puts a lot of her heart into her gifts."

However, for the unexperienced in arts and crafts, there are many easier and faster options.

Dennis Marten, owner and manager of Ben Franklin Crafts, said students often buy materials to make presents during the holiday season.

"The most popular items are the padded photo albums that they make to store their college memories," Marten said.

The materials required for the album are a photo album, batting, fabric, tacky glue or hot glue if a hot glue gun is available, and mat board.

To put together the album, begin by cutting out the batting an inch past the edge of the cover. Attach it to the cover by folding the excess over and taping it to the inside.

Cut out the fabric two inches past the edge, and attach it the same way, then glue a piece of mat board to the inside of the cover on both sides.

"You can add lace or ribbon or eyelets, and it usually runs about a $10 project," said Linda Paul, junior undecided who works in the craft department at Wal-Mart.

Paul also suggested covering picture frames with batting and fabric. The frames can be filled with a picture of the giver and the receiver together.

Many students buy their presents because they think they don't have the time or skill to make something nice, but there are many projects that don't require much of either.

"If I had time, I would because I think it's nice to get things that people make for you because it's more personal," Susan Haeker, junior in hotel and restaurant management, said.

What motivates most young people on a tight budget to make gifts is money.

"It's cheaper to make your own presents. I make candles and cards and little paper-mache ornaments," Tori Johnson, Manhattan resident, said.

"I use ordinary household containers to mold my candles, like yogurt containers or bowls, because it gives them interesting shapes," Johnson said. "I also set them with potpourri oil. They sell 10-pound slabs of wax at Ben Franklin."

Some gifts students make take less skill and more thought about the people receiving them.

Photographs and personal messages can help make meaningful gifts for good friends or close relatives.

"I'm making a collage for my friend. You put a lot of pictures of the two of you together in it and then frame it," Tammy Caldwell, junior in pre-nursing, said.

"Another thing you can make is those coupons like you made when you were little. They can say free car wash or a hug whenever you want one or cleaning the house or

No need to spend all your money on gifts when you can

Make it yourself

Making a padded photo album

Many students find making gifts is not only cheaper but also more personal. Here is how to make one popular item, a padded photo album:

Materials: photo album, batting, fabric, mat board, Tacky or hot glue gun, tape, scissors

1. Cut out the batting an inch past the edge of the cover.

2. Attach it to the cover by folding the excess over and taping it to the inside.

3. Cut out the fabric two inches past the edge and attach it the same way.

4. Glue a piece of mat board to the inside of the cover.

5. Personalize the cover, and the project is complete.

breakfast in bed."

Hand-made gifts made with the receiver's taste and interests in mind are often more special than store-bought presents.

"It shows that they could have gone out and bought you something, but they took the time to make you something," Brian Howard, junior in graphic design, said.

Budget Christmas

Some non-traditional students face a dilemma at Christmas — how to provide all the toys their children want story by Scott Allen Miller

For those who don't fit the mold of the typical student, the holidays present special challenges.

While most students are scrambling to buy cards and presents for parents and siblings, non-traditional students are scraping together the resources to buy things for their children and grandchildren. Unlike parents, brothers and sisters, children are more disappointed when Santa Claus can't bring more things for them to enjoy.

Students with children have to find ways to make the holidays special for their young ones even with their often-limited finances. Some of these students are nearly destitute.

"There are a number of students at this University who are using the state welfare system to get through school," Nancy Bolson, director of adult student services, said.

Bolson recommended that students who need help in getting a visit from Santa for their children seek assistance from community resources such as the Toys For Tots program and the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Al Myers, Manhattan director of Toys For Tots, said he helped children believe in the generosity of their parents and Santa, rather than the generosity of him or the community.

"I want them to all say, 'Hey, I got this from Mom and Dad,' not from Mr. Myers," he said.

It is for this reason that Myers suggested parents leave their children at home when they come pick out presents. Myers also believes parents make better gift choices than the children themselves do.

Myers, a retired police officer who has been involved with Toys For Tots for more than 30 years, relies on the generosity of individuals, families and businesses to make Christmas a joy for children in Manhattan.

"We want people to take all they want, as much as they want, but not more than they need," Myers said. "We have lots of toys."

The Flint Hills Breadbasket helps bring toys to children in the area as well as food.

About a quarter of the families the Breadbasket helps during the Christmas season are students, but the number could be higher, said Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"There's quite a few because of the families at Jardine Terrace," she said. Bramhall said she believed the true number of student families her organization helped during the holidays was higher than 25 percent because many live off campus and can't be identified as students.

One program the Flint Hills Breadbasket sponsors is Adopt-A-Family. In this program, individuals, families and organizations choose to fulfill the requests of a family in need during the holidays.

Secret Santas do the shopping for those who wish to donate money but don't have time to personally buy the gifts of the sponsored family.

"We do have a lot of people who donate, but quite frankly, they don't always have the time to shop because they're busy shopping for their own families sometimes," Bramhall said. "And this is a way they can help out anyway."

Adopt-A-Family helps between 300 and 400 families in Manhattan, she said.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket doesn't just make a way for children to receive presents they would do without. It also helps them have the chance to give presents, too.

Manhattan K-mart comes to the Flint Hills Breadbasket seeking underprivileged children who want to buy gifts for their loved ones on the store's tab, Bramhall said.

Children can decide to whom they wish to give the presents, she said.

"It's up to the child, basically," Bramhall said.

Finally, the Flint Hills Breadbasket has set up Giving Trees in Kmart and in the K-State Student Union Bookstore.

Families in need have their wishes listed on pieces of paper that decorate the tree. Patrons of the store take a piece of paper and buy the gifts requested.

The Kmart tree is for general needs and serves about 25 families, Bramhall said. The Union Bookstore, which helps 109 families, has requests for children's books, she said.

But not all students are having such hard times.

Penny Suazo, senior in elementary special education, and her husband are not sitting on Easy Street, but they are expecting some outside help to make this Christmas special for her 3-year-old son.

"We pray that Grandma gets a lot of gifts," Suazo said. "They always do, though."

Suazo is grateful she is not in the situation of some of her neighbors. One couple she knows are both full-time students who had to request their two children's grandparents help Santa out this year by themselves, she said.

Suazo said Santa's gifts for her son were purchased months ago.

"A lot of toys were bought with student loans back in August," she said.

After the family returns from their native Colorado after Christmas, Suazo's son will find

Students set Christmas-gift budgets

Jennifer Taylor
staff reporter

Christmas is a time of giving, receiving and celebrating. However, the giving part gets tough when you are strapped for cash.

College students often seem to be low on cash, but many have set budgets that allow themselves certain amounts for friends and family members.

The typical amount students are willing to set for presents for their parents is between $20 and $40.

Beth Romero, senior in family studies and human services, usually spends $40.

"It depends each year," Romero said.

Jim Farnham, junior in mathematics, said he sets aside an amount of money and then buys his mother whatever she has been wanting.

"Last year, I bought my mom a sweater and a nice shirt. This year, I might make her a card by hand with glue and construction paper," Farnham said.

Lana Ryland, senior in pre-nursing, said she buys her parents books and gift certificates.

Sometimes family members will combine money and go in together for a gift someone in their family has been wanting.

"Our family, my three siblings and I, chip in and buy our mom a gift from all of us," Romero said.

Adam Hein, graduate student in nuclear engineering, said his family pitches money in and whatever they all agree on is what they buy.

Not all students are on a budget.

Kelly Seba, sophomore in geography, said her parents give her money to buy Christmas presents.

"This year they are getting K-State sweatshirts," Seba said. "Any little thing, like a key chain, mug or K-State stuff, is nice."

Jill Deshler, senior in elementary education, said she doesn't have a budget, but she only spends a certain amount on her parents.

"I'll buy my dad a book and my mom some sort of kitchen thing. Not a spatula or anything like that, but something nice," Deshler said.

Rhonda Taylor, personnel manager for the Palace in Aggieville, said the Palace sells many Christmas items.

"Lots of K-State items are sold. Candy, figurines that represent Christmas and Heritage Village are big sellers. People will buy calendars for the new year, inspirational and quote books," Taylor said.

In case you just can't think of what to buy someone, Varney's Bookstore in Aggieville prints a holiday catalog to give people ideas.

Bonnie Williams, trade book manager for Varney's, said Varney's has a bargain book sale every year around the holiday season.

"We sell all different kinds of books, children's, art, cookbooks and reference books," Williams said.

The K-State Union Bookstore also has a holiday book sale. The Union bookstore notices an increase in the sales of sweatshirts and t-shirts, Kathy Austin, senior in kinesiology, said.

Gifts don't have to drain the bank

Rachelle Harkness
staff reporter

If you're not careful, trying to fulfill the love of your life's Christmas wish list can drain your piggy bank.

It's no secret — college students are poor. But there's no need to drain all of your blood plasma for a mere $15 a pop, or send off for that new credit card with an outrageous credit limit and high interest rates just to purchase the perfect gift for your special someone.

"I'd be happy with a stuffed animal from Wal-Mart. They're only $9," Amy Coulson, junior in marketing, said.

Making your own gifts can be inexpensive as well as creative. The thought you put into the gift is worth more than the dollar value.

"A little Beethoven, Bach, or Mozart beside the fire with a nice candlelight dinner would be a great gift for Christmas," Jessica Whisler, junior in kinesiology, said.

Even a homemade food gift wrapped up and put under the tree would be a tasty idea.

"You could make sugar cookies together and decorate them, or I wouldn't mind getting a batch of chocolate chip cookies under the tree," Lori Pape, junior in secondary education, said.

There are countless ideas for inexpensive gifts at Christmas time. Earrings, hats, stuffed animals, personalized cards, care packages, candles and gift certificates are all good ideas.

"It's not the price of something that counts. It's the personal thought behind the gift that matters," Stephanie Young, junior in elementary education, said.

Even so, some people wish for something elaborate.

"I'd take a new TV — or better yet, I'd just take free cable," Paul Meyer, senior in architectural engineering, said.

While a lot of students will be searching the stores for Christmas gifts, some will still be looking for someone to buy a gift for.

"I'd just like to have a significant other," Jill Nicholson, junior in history, said.

SECRET PRESENTS

GROUP MEMBERS BOOST HOLIDAY SPIRIT
BY EXCHANGING GIFTS WITH ONE ANOTHER

STORY BY GINA BUSTER — ART BY MATT HAWKINS

Christmas triggers many images for people, but one of the most common is presents. And presents go hand in hand with secrets.

Secret Santa gifts are often exchanged among co-workers and club members to foster holiday spirit and fun.

Brenda Schaffer, K-State cashier accountant, said the cashier's office has organized a gift exchange for the last eight years she has been at the office.

"We put everyone's name in a hat and draw names. We keep the names a secret, and then we have a potluck lunch during the noon hour and open gifts," Schaffer said.

A limit of $10 is set for gifts, and some popular gift ideas are K-State T-shirts, K-State mouse pads and earrings. Yankee candles, potpourri and 1996 calendars are also favorite ideas, she said.

"It's fun to give to other people and see their reaction," Schaffer said. "It's fun to give."

Diana Havenstein, assistant manager of Rod's Hallmark Shop in Westloop, said the first step to finding a great gift is to know the interests of the recipient.

"We try to find out about the recipient and get any kind of hint to go on," Havenstein said. "We start by asking customers about the recipient. Do they collect anything? Do they have any hobbies or special interests?"

If you have no idea of anything the person would want, Havenstein suggested Yankee candles, picture frames, photo albums, stationery or any kind of Christmas decorations.

Rebecca Kastner, manager of Country Gift Shop, said its employees often have an ongoing secret gift exchange.

"The employees of the two shops draw names, and last week we started doing things for our secret pals," Kastner said. "Some people have a theme, and all their gifts relate to that theme, and others do little things not related at all."

Because things get so busy in December, Kastner said the Secret Santas reveal their identities to their secret pals the first weekend of December.

"The employees voted by ballot on the amount they wanted to spend on their secret pals. They can spend either $3 to $5 each week on gifts or $20 at the end," Kastner said.

For those hard-to-buy-for secret pals, notepads, stationery, dessert coffees, mugs, picture frames and secret pal cards make great gifts.

Many popular men's gifts include kindle candles, letter openers, money clips, K-State and KU items and calendars, she said.

Havenstein said they have Jack Daniel's and Budweiser items, puzzles and "Far Side" calendars for men's gifts.

Kastner said popular women's gifts include ornaments, brass items, Boyd's bears and Camille Beckman hand cream.

"In this busy time of year, it makes the day fun and creative,"

Kastner said. "It's always nice to get a present, and the fact that it's a secret is a lot of fun. We like to do fun things out here, and it kind of gets our creative juices going."

Will buy Christmas cards to send to friends to say hello. For me, it is a commercial holiday, not a really religious one.

SHIH-YEN LIN, GRADUATE STUDENT IN ENGINEERING

Holiday isolation

■ Inclusion important during the Christmas season

Claudette Riley
staff writer

For members of non-Christian faith groups, the Christmas season is not a time of celebration and inclusion.

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, said students and campus leaders on the Committee on Religion are concerned with the isolation of non-Christian faith groups during Christmas.

"We have become aware of how religion and our faith attitudes affect our world community and often how this misunderstanding leads to oppression," Fallon said. "Things that are done to isolate and hurt people come from ignorance and insensitivity."

Members of the committee on religion represent Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, Islam, Hinduism, Jainism and Sikhism.

"We saw the Christmas season as a time to show that we are committed to peace, non-violence and tolerance," Fallon said. "This is a good opportunity to express our concerns in an intent to bring about an understanding of religious pluralism."

Letters were sent to the K-State Student Union and the residence halls suggesting religious holy day observances be sensitive to social pluralism and affirm other faith groups in the planning of displays in public areas, Fallon said.

Fallon said the committee also suggested greater education and awareness of other major faith groups should include support and funding of those groups for displays considered in public areas.

"We are acting on concerns from major faith groups that have felt a sense of insensitivity to their own beliefs and holiday traditions," Fallon said. "Our overall hope is that such an awareness will provide opportunities for people in other faith groups to express who they are and find a sense of acceptance."

The committee conceded that major holidays fall during different times, but offered itself as a resource to provide speakers, panelists and materials for displays, Fallon said.

"If we get to know people from other faith groups, we'll break down stereotypes and come to a deeper awareness of the world community and our individual humanity," Fallon said.

Shih-Yen Lin, graduate student in engineering, said he wished others knew more about his faith. He said even as a Buddhist he participates in some Christmas celebrations.

"I will buy Christmas cards to send to friends to say hello. I know from my knowledge, that it is Jesus' birthday, but I don't say that this is my way of celebrating that," Lin said. "For me, it is a commercial holiday not really a religious one."

Lin said he is also considering hanging Christmas lights.

"Buddhism accepts all kinds of religions, and it just asks us to be a good person so there is no conflict for me," Lin said. "I know a lot about Christmas, but people should know about other religions and about their particular decorations and cultures."

Debbie Perlman, senior in business administration, said her family was the only Jewish family in the small Nebraska town where she grew up.

"Around Christmas time, since the holiday was so publicized and people go all out for it, I felt it was unfair. We were forced to learn about the Christmas holiday," Perlman said. "Most people didn't understand my religion, so mom came to school to explain our holidays to the class."

Perlman said her family observed their beliefs and attended Temple services in nearby Lincoln. She said when she came to K-State, she met many Jewish students and students of other faiths.

"For the people on the committee, our discussions have been very eye-opening. When we discuss things, everyone shares their views and I've found that there are so many other faith groups who have felt the same things," Perlman said. "I always felt very lonely around Christmas because everyone was so busy with their families."

Christmas is a good time to gain attention and show that other faith groups have holidays that are as important to them, Perlman said.

"Knowing people from other faith groups is making me more diverse and helping me understand how different people are in this world and what they believe and why," Perlman said.

CHRISTMAS SPIRIT

WE ASKED K-STATE STUDENTS TO GIVE THEIR DEFINITIONS OF THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT

TEXT GATHERED BY KIMBERLY KIRCHER

20 IDEAS TO HELP PROMOTE THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS

1. Volunteer at homeless shelters.
2. Wish someone you normally don't talk to a Merry Christmas.
3. Give canned goods and clothing to the poor.
4. Make someone smile.
5. Adopt a family to give clothes, food and toys to them.
6. Christmas carol.
7. Give to the underprivileged.
8. Be creative, and make something from the heart.
9. Do something anonymous for someone.
10. Forgive and restore relationships.
11. Let people close to you know you really love and care for them.
12. Hug your parents.
13. Give people what they don't have.
14. Remember that little things make a big difference.
15. Donate to Project Share.
16. Send a card to someone you don't know very well.
17. Take someone out to dinner.
18. Lift someone's spirits by complementing them.
19. Put money in someone else's parking meter.
20. Give someone a ride home from school on those cold winter days.

"It's what everybody wishes they could feel - agape love," Kristina Crays, senior in fine arts said. "It's spiritual. Peace, hope and happiness."

"The spirit of giving seems like an old cliché, and I think that people have lost it," Amy Betz, sophomore in marketing, said. "To me it is all about giving because Jesus Christ gave ultimately - He gave his life."

"The birth of the Savior, Jesus Christ and to be like him by giving joy to others," said Anne Liebengood, sophomore in human development and family studies.

"It is the birth of Jesus Christ and spending time with family," Todd Nisly, sophomore undecided, said.

"Following past family traditions and reminding ourselves what the basics of life are," Todd Black, senior in civil engineering, said.

"I picture my house and spending time at home," Kam Dubois, sophomore in landscape architecture, said.

"Being with people is my honest answer because it sucks to be alone," Jim Farnham, junior in mathematics, said.

"The spirit of Christmas is what you as an individual wants it to be, but personally, I think of Jesus Christ, my family and home," Tanith Garner, senior in psychology, said.

what Santa left him — with a little help from a neighbor — when he returns. While the family is in Colorado, Santa will get some help from a neighbor who will arrange the toys bought in August inside the family's apartment.

Mary Jane Mangino, freshman in elementary education, isn't quite in the financial strain that Suazo is in but still has stress from holidays.

Mangino's husband, Mark, is an assistant football coach and recruiting coordinator. Mary Jane's family income isn't as low as many other non-traditional students, but it does get strained during the holidays. She said life goes on in spite of the increased expenses of the holidays.

"No matter if you make $100,000, $20,000 or $5,000, Christmas is a strain," Mangino said.

"It's not like you get a grace period to pay your other bills during December."

Her two children are old enough not to be attached too much to visits from Santa, which she believes helps ease the holidays. Now that the Wildcats are going to bowl games during the holidays, the Manginos celebrate Christmas during the middle of the month and let their children buy themselves gifts in the cities that host the bowl games, she said.

Not all students providing for children at Christmas give only to their own children. Some give presents to their children's children.

Steve Mason, doctoral candidate in education administration, has four children and four grandchildren. All of his children but one have graduated from high school, and his grandchildren's ages range from 5 months to 5 years old.

In addition to teaching special education at Manhattan Middle School and attending classes, Mason and his wife work several odd jobs to make extra money for the holidays, he said. They don't work to make ends meet, but rather to help maintain their financial status quo.

"We do it to maintain our lifestyle through all the changes," he said.

The couple has done repair work, yard work, general housecleaning and tutoring outside the school district to help make sure they don't have to dip into their savings to provide for their grandchildren, which Mason believes is important.

"What I've done I consider normal and natural in the order of things I have to do," he said.

"You have to remind little kids that they're loved, that their grandparents love them."

Although he and his wife might be tired from all the extra work, Mason said he believed the hard work he does was part of his morality.

"You have to work hard to get what you want, and I guess that's just a traditional-American value system," he said.

"When I've got some things to do in order to get things and have things, well, I just do it."

PARTY

and preparing food for a party. For example, if hosts want to serve popcorn, they shouldn't pop it in the microwave.

"If you know how to pop popcorn out of the jar, you can save hundreds of dollars," he said.

Willis said spending too much time on the particulars of food preparation might prevent hosts from enjoying the party themselves.

"You don't want to spend your whole party running back and forth to the kitchen because you decided to have crab legs," he said.

"If you're going to have a lot of complicated food, you're going to get stressed out."

Willis recommended buying meat wholesale if feeding a lot of people and said a good way to keep the holiday spirit was to serve turkey — not one you've baked yourself, but pre-cooked, sliced turkey on crackers — something anyone can do that won't take a lot of time.

As far as alcohol, Willis said there was no need for students to break the bank there, either.

"Don't go out and buy Jack Daniel's and Weller's scotch unless you've got a lot of money. Most people can't tell the difference between Jack Daniel's and a Kentucky deluxe whiskey," Willis said.

Willis recommended mixing drinks that would be refreshing, not too strong and fun to drink, using fruit juice and other mixes.

"Instead of spending money in your liquor, spend money on your mixes," he said.

Schneider said he agreed.

"If you're mixing, you're not going to go wrong with a slightly cheaper liquor," he said.

"You don't want to spend your whole party running back and forth to the kitchen because you decided to have crab legs."

LUKE WILLIS
HEAD HOUSEMAN AT BOOKERS II CATERING

Schneider recommended a hot drink for parties.

"Something really good is mead wine, which is wine made of honey," he said. "You put that in a crock pot with a few cinnamon sticks and cloves, and that's really good, but you don't want to boil it."

Willis said concentrating too much on alcohol could ruin a party.

"Stay away from shots," he said. "You don't want your friends drunk — you just want them to have a good time."

Leota Hanson of Hanson Retail Liquor said students tended to spend more money around the holidays — buying a lot of champagne, for example.

"You sell more of those than your wines," she said.

Hanson said she also saw more students spending money on more expensive hard liquor around Christmas.

"They tend to buy the more expensive, like Crown Royal and stuff, around holiday time," Hanson said.

Wyatt said he also bought more expensive liquor around the holidays.

"I've been doing this for three or four years now, and I'm a student myself. And I tend to buy a name brand rather than the cheaper stuff," he said.

Reading brings Words to life

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

Images of Santa Claus and talking trains were brought to life during book readings at the K-State Student Union Bookstore this week.

Three K-State students had a chance to test their storytelling abilities with Children's Book Week, which was sponsored by the Union Bookstore this week.

The theme of the week is stories about trains. One student told of a train that took children to see Santa Claus, and another told the story about the little engine that could.

"I liked the Polar Express the best," Teddy Hatch, a child from the audience, said. "The best part was when they got to meet Santa."

Scott Heun, senior in political science, said the project was part of his storytelling class.

"We had a group project where we picked an age group to do a presentation for," he said.

The students have been working hard to put together a format that will be enjoyable to the kids, Mary Nichols, instructor of speech, said. "We had a dress rehearsal for each group during class," Nichols said.

"This gives a critique for the students, and we can work with them before they actually perform."

Storytelling is really like putting a play together, Nichols said.

"We got together four or five times outside of class," Christina Welch, senior in anthropology, said.

After practicing among themselves and rehearsing in front of their class, the students were ready to test their skills with the children.

"Once we got started, it was real easy," Welch said. "The little kids really appreciate it a lot more than older people."

The storytelling groups usually travel to different schools to read to the children.

"I usually send programs to a specific place because it's hard to get kids to come here," Nichols said.

Nichols said it was great to see the children relating to the students.

"The kids feel like they're really close to the storytellers," Nichols said.

"I've seen them run up to them in the mall and hug them."

Pep rally planned for last Big 8 game

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Showing Wildcat spirit might have a big payoff for fans at the Big 8 Final Pep Rally at 5 tonight in Aggieville.

The K-State Marching Band, Classy Cats and Willie the Wildcat are all slated to perform on the Cat Tracker bus in the 1200 block of Moro Street.

No parking will be allowed in the designated area from 3 p.m. until the end of the rally.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said the businesses rallied in support.

"We've always wanted to do a pep rally, but this one is special because it is the last Big 8 game we play going into the Big 12," Sieben said.

"Our merchants wanted to show our pride and the spirit we have in Aggieville and the community."

The craziest Wildcat outfit will win a K-State Starter jacket from Ballard's. Attendance by the largest group will win a tailgate party, donated by Lucky BrewGrille.

First prize in the Best ABC Sports Banner competition will win a bus trip for four to the Cotton Bowl, donated by Classic Tours. Second prize will win 20 Lady Cat tickets for today's game, donated by Big Dawg Marina.

Brad Finkeldei, senior in chemical engineering and K-State student body vice president, said ABC Sports would film the rally to air during the televised game against Colorado.

"It's one of the biggest games ever. It's important because it's Colorado, a nationally ranked team, and because we have a chance to go 10-1 and go to a bowl game," Finkeldei said.

"Students are just excited and talking about it, and this is a great way for them to get out and show their spirit."

ATTORNEY GENERAL

Reno says disease won't hinder work

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With medication controlling the shaking of her left hand, Attorney General Janet Reno said her newly diagnosed Parkinson's disease will neither force her from office nor cease her long weekend walks along the Potomac River.

"I feel fine now. I continue to take my long walks," the 57-year-old attorney general said at her weekly news conference Thursday. "I don't feel like I have any impairment. I feel strong and feel like moving ahead."

She has an excellent long-term prognosis, her doctor, Jonathan Pincus, a neurology professor at Georgetown University Medical Center, said at a later news conference. Her mild tremor was completely eliminated with modest doses of medication, he said.

Reno disclosed that she was diagnosed three weeks ago with the progressive disease that undermines muscle control. Doctors assured her that, like hundreds of thousands of other Americans with Parkinson's, she could continue working without impairment.

For reporters, who previously had noted a tremor in her hand, Reno thrust out a steady left hand to demonstrate that medication has controlled her only symptom. She takes 1-1/2 Sinemet pills before each of her three daily meals.

Earlier in the morning, Reno had advised the White House. She said Chief of Staff Leon Panetta was supportive. President Clinton telephoned Reno later in the day.

"The president has complete confidence now, as he always did, that the attorney general will continue to pursue her job in the excellent manner she has in the past," a statement issued by the White House press office said.

Reno made clear she had no intention of resigning.

"If I didn't think I could do the job, I'd be the first to tell President Clinton," Reno said. "Based on everything the doctors told me and what I know, there should be no reason why, if the president wanted me to come back in a second term, I wouldn't do so."

It is estimated that nearly 1 million Americans have Parkinson's, but only half have symptoms severe enough to have been diagnosed, said Dr. Stanley Fahn, a neurology professor at New York's Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center.

Housing costs rising

Kimberly Heffling
staff reporter

From fiscal year 1990 to 1995, the cost of housing at K-State increased 42.5 percent and could increase another 2.7 percent next year.

Nationally, the average cost for housing has only increased 23.9 percent since 1990.

Cost of housing would be $3,490 in fall 1996 under a proposal heard by the Kansas Board of Regents Thursday. This is a $120 increase this year.

Since 1990, there has been an increase in the cost of housing at each of the regents schools.

Ray Hauke, budget director for the regents, said an estimated 3-percent increase from last year at almost all regents schools will be necessary to keep up with food costs and salary increases.

The board will vote in December on this measure.

In other business, Phyllis Nolan, board member, presented the board with a report titled "Vision 2020: Transforming the Kansas Regents Universities for the 21st Century."

STUDENT GOVERNMENT

Student Senate approves election guidelines Thursday

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate approved the 1995-96 elections guidelines Thursday night.

Few changes were made from last year's guidelines, said Chad Schneider, Senate Elections Committee chairman.

The biggest change for this year's election is the grievance and violations process.

"In first readings, Senate was leery of the grievance process being the same as last year," Schneider said.

Last year, Senate approved election results. It could have voted to not allow election violators to take their seats, but it did not. No candidates lost their seats because of campaign violations. Violators were also not allowed to speak on their behalf.

The Elections Committee spent the last two weeks trying to devise a system that had more teeth.

"In the committee's position, we feel that if anyone violates the regulations, they should be taken out of their seat," Schneider said.

The committee is made of at-large members, and it is not representative of the entire campus, he said. Schneider said the committee decided to give Senate the power to approve candidates with violations.

"Senate should do it because they were elected by the whole student body," Schneider said.

When the election results are presented to Senate, all candidates with violations will be listed with an asterisk next to their names.

Below the list of names of elected candidates, the name of the next person on the list who could receive that seat will appear. On a separate piece of paper, the candidate's violation will be recorded.

"The person will have the opportunity to come before Senate to defend themselves," he said. "If the person never comes forward to be voted on, the person will be taken out of their seat automatically."

Approval of a candidate with violations will take a two-thirds vote of Senate.

Then Senate will vote on the entire results, Schneider said.

Students who are unhappy with the grievance process can still appeal Senate's decision of to Student Tribunal.

Schneider said names of violators

SGA election guideline changes

These are the changes in the 1995-96 SGA election guidelines presented Oct. 26 and passed Thursday night by Student Senate.

■ Campaign materials changes:

It is recommended campaign materials that will be posted on campus be printed on stock paper of at least 110 pound weight. Off-campus postings must follow city posting regulations.

■ Polling stations

Each candidate must follow each individual campus building's posting regulations. Campaign postings must also be received and stamped on the front side by the office in charge of the building.

■ Time limits

There are no time limits for off-campus posting of materials.

■ Expenditure limits

The student body president and vice president, the Board of Student Publications, Fine Arts Council and the Union Governing Board may not spend in excess of 75 percent of the tuition paid by a full-time, in-state undergraduate student for that semester.

Student Senate and college council candidates may spend up to 10 percent of the tuition paid by a full-time, in-state undergraduate student for that semester. The amount the student body president and vice president candidates may spend in the run-off election cannot exceed 25 percent of the tuition paid by a full-time, in-state undergraduate student for that semester.

■ Campaign grievances/violations

At the Senate meeting following the final election, campaign violations and recommendations for handling these violations will be presented to the current Senate along with the election results.

Candidates found in violation of campaign regulations will be denoted with an asterisk (*) next to their name on the election results.

Candidates with an asterisk (*) shall be brought to the attention of Senate. Senate must decide on a case-by-case basis by a two-thirds vote on the approval of each candidate found in violation.

If Senate fails to approve the candidate found in violation or the candidate refuses to appear before Senate, the Senate seat will be given to the next person on the election list.

DONATION

Individual pledges $100,000

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

The $100,000 contribution from K-State to Troy Design and Manufacturing Co. is not K-State money.

"That $100,000 contribution is not coming out of University funds," President Jon Wefald said. "That money was pledged by an individual on behalf of K-State."

The individual, who is remaining anonymous, was contacted by K-State authorities and offered to pledge the $100,000 for this project, said Robert Krause, vice president of institutional advancement.

"Back when the Chamber of Commerce was making up an incentive package for the TDM natural-gas facility, they listed K-State as a contributor of $100,000," Krause said. "We didn't have that kind of money, so we went

K-STATE LIVESTOCK JUDGING TEAM PLACES FIRST 2 YEARS RUNNING

The K-State livestock judging team placed first this week in the National Collegiate Livestock Judging Contest in Louisville, Ky.

This is the second consecutive year the team has won the national competition, Scott Schaake, livestock judging team coach, said.

"It is really difficult to win the national contest two years in a row. It is very seldom done. I sensed within the first month of working with them that they would be a really good team. They didn't disappoint me," Schaake said.

As a team, K-State ranked first in oral reasons, first in swine, first in sheep and second in cattle.

Chris Mullinix, senior in animal sciences and industry, received top national individual honors at the competition, and he also placed first in sheep, swine and oral reasons, Schaake said.

Jennifer Barker, senior in animal sciences and industry, received fifth overall, second in oral reasons, ninth in swine and ninth in cattle.

Jeff Brandenberger, senior in animal sciences and industry, placed fifth in sheep.

Kristopher Osborn, senior in animal sciences and industry, placed sixth in cattle.

Throughout the 80 years of the national livestock judging contest, this is the 10th time the K-State team has placed first, Schaake said.

Besides last year, the last time K-State won the national competition was in 1983, when Schaake was a member of the team.

3RD-ANNUAL HOLIDAY PARADE TO FEATURE DIFFERENT CULTURES

The 1995 Holiday Parade Dec. 3 will provide an opportunity for people to show how they celebrate the holiday season.

Manhattan Mainstreet, a group dedicated to historic downtown revitalization, will sponsor the event.

"A lot of people celebrate different things during the holiday period," Scott Morrill, director of Manhattan Mainstreet, said.

"With Manhattan being a multi-cultural community, we wanted to give people an idea of the different customs."

"Our goal is to educate, but the parade is still in its early stages. We need to get to where a lot of cultures participate," he said.

Angie Geist, parade co-chair, said the deadline for entries was Nov. 27.

About 60 entries participated in the parade last year. This is the third year for the parade, Morrill said.

Campus groups, including the K-State Marching Band, have entered this year's parade.

KSU ALUMNI ASSOCIATION SPONSORING LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE

The KSU Alumni Association will sponsor a leadership conference for alumni volunteers for the first time in more than eight years.

The leadership conference, Saturday, is for volunteers who organize activities in many of the 60 alumni clubs in Kansas and the rest of the country.

"Our basic goal is to meet with all of the club volunteers and help educate them on what the Alumni Association can do for them," John White, director of alumni clubs, said.

"This weekend's meeting will also allow them to talk with other volunteers from all across the country. They will be able to pick each other's brains and talk about future events," he said.

Other activities include discussions about club programming, promotional mailings, scholarship assistance and recruitment.

Among the speakers are Amy Button Renz, president of the Alumni Association; Robert Krause, K-State vice president for institutional advancement; and Patty Clark, chairman of the Alumni Association board of directors.

"We will have several short speeches, which are basically welcome speeches," White said. "Then we will get into the main part of the conference. We'll talk about all of the topics, and we will also distribute the new club manuals."

Forty-two alumni club leaders have registered for the meeting, and White said he expected a good turnout for the conference.

"It doesn't hurt that this is scheduled on the same weekend of the biggest football game in K-State history," he said. "This is the first time that we've done this in eight or nine years. I'm really pleased with the number of people who have registered."

The conference is scheduled before the kickoff for the K-State vs. Colorado football game.

"We were going to have a post-game reception," White said. "But the game got moved back to 2:30 p.m. That was actually a blessing for us. Now, we will have a breakfast reception and only a small post-game recap. It will also give us more time to get our work done. We would have been more rushed if the game hadn't been moved back."

Weekend festivities focus on cultures

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

Students can be culturally uplifted with dance, music, food and a fashion show from different countries at International Night Saturday.

International Night, which is sponsored by the International Coordinating Council, will begin at 5 p.m. at the Manhattan Middle School.

Nyambe Harleston, senior in monetary policy and banking and treasurer of ICC, said food from Japan, China, Taiwan, India and Africa will be served at the beginning of the evening.

Groups will also demonstrate different dances, songs, clothes and music of their culture at 7 p.m., Harleston said.

"It's a great way to get involved. I think it's important for everyone to be open to other people's cultures and for everyone to make an effort to mingle and learn because you never know who you'll meet," she said.

Nabeeha Kazi, senior in public relations and president of ICC, said five to eight organizations would be cooking dishes from their countries and participating in events that represent their culture in some aspect.

The night allows the international community to show the Manhattan community a bit of culture and tradition, Kazi said.

Motaz Hourani, adviser to ICC and program coordinator at the International Student Center, said International Night should further introduce the different cultures of K-State beyond campus activities.

"Our philosophy is to take advantage of natural resources, and we see these students as resources who can present their culture to those in the community," he said.

Harleston said there will also be an international dance from 9:30 p.m. to 1 a.m. tonight in Union Station.

The dance is free and sponsored by ICC and Union Program Council, she said.

"The main point in having this dance is to revive the club," Harleston said. "We want as many people to get involved as possible. International Club is for everyone, which includes Americans and those from other countries."

to people that are supportive of K-State and asked for contributions."

K-State representatives had only a weekend to get some people to help support the project, Krause said.

"We were under a time deadline to have some money to commit before the chamber proposed the incentive package to the Manhattan City Commission," he said.

In the Nov. 7 meeting, the city commission voted 5-0 to approve $1.24 million to enable TDM to bring a natural-gas-conversion facility to Manhattan. The facility will be an addition to TDM's electric-vehicle production plant, which is scheduled to be operational by May 1996.

The $1.24 million approved by the city commission is only a portion of the $2 million TDM needed.

The remaining funds came from area sources. K-State contributed $100,000, Riley and Pottawatomie counties contributed $450,000, Western Resources will be contributing $100,000 in energy use and numerous private sector contributions added up to $100,000.

Randy Martin, president of Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said the money from contributions was not due until Jan. 2.

It is not yet known to whom the individual will contribute the money.

"The contributor has a variety of options," Wefald said. "Obviously, the money could go straight to TDM, or the money could be given to K-State."

"If the money goes right to the University, then it would go directly to Jim Hague and his electric-vehicle research," Wefald said.

The difference between giving the money to the University or giving it to TDM is whether the individual would want a tax deduction. The University is a not-for-profit organization. TDM is not.

"Clearly, if a charitable tax deduction is involved, the money would go through the Foundation," Wefald said.

Although a contribution straight to the University wouldn't benefit TDM directly, TDM would benefit in the long run from the research done by K-State's electric-vehicle program.

'Music Man' prop master hits the malls in search of antiques

Joni Pruitt
staff reporter

Worms, pitchforks, ice cream cones.

Hardly a typical shopping list. When Luke Kahlich, director, handed Jill Huguet, prop master, this prop list for "The Music Man," her job was to hit the malls — antique malls, that is.

And while most people would be jealous of such a seemingly easy task, Huguet described it as the job from hell.

That's because unlike the costume or set crews, who could manipulate their designs to reflect the era, Huguet had to find props that were actually used in 1912.

"I had to do a lot of begging, borrowing and pleading to the antique shops in town," Huguet said. "I had to be a little bit of a salesman and schmoozer all in one."

Huguet said most of the shops were given free tickets to "The Music Man" for donating their antiques.

Because some of the antiques are worth more than $200, Huguet struck quite a deal.

Among some of the more expensive props are a $250 Civil War rifle, $105 desk and $175 chair.

Huguet said negotiating for the antiques was much easier when the antique owners discovered all the props would be insured and paid for if the antiques were damaged.

"It's so scary to think that this stuff is put on a rolling unit and rolled in the dark for scene changes," she said. "We just pray to God that nothing gets broken."

"I sat in the $175 chair, and it broke in half. Vern was able to fix it, but it was pretty scary. It will never happen again because I will refuse to park my butt in it," she said.

Huguet began gathering more than 50 props as soon as rehearsals for the musical began.

She created long shopping lists of props suggested by the script or by Kahlich.

Most of the props are red, white and blue to create an Americana feel to the production.

"We're trying to decorate the set into the Fourth of July tacky motif," she said. "It's not a musical unless it's tacky — we're talking Cheez Whiz all the way."

Although the production opens tonight, Huguet was still scrambling on Wednesday to find props that were added at the last minute.

"Almost everything was the hardest thing to find," Huguet said.

"We were supposed to have a live horse and buggy, but nobody in this town wanted their horse to walk across the stage. Actually, though, the hardest thing to find was a pitchfork. I went to eight dealers, and no one seemed to have them," she said.

Huguet also had trouble finding 12 matching library chairs because most chairs are made of plastic, which wasn't used in 1912.

Despite her effort to make the props as authentic as possible, sometimes it was impossible.

"Our flags have too many stars," Huguet said.

"In 1912, they would have only had 42. Hopefully, no one will pay attention and say, 'Hey, the flags have too many stars. Come on, we're leaving,'" she said.

Unfortunately, most props that took hours to find will appear on stage for a matter of seconds.

"The Civil War rifle will be carried on stage, an actor will get poked with it, and it is taken off stage," she said.

"We also got worms, or lures. People will run on and say, 'Hey, I've got some worms left,' and they will run off. The audience won't even know the worms are in there, but the director wanted them anyway," Huguet said.

Even if the audience doesn't notice them, the props play an important role for the actors.

"It helps them do their job better," Huguet said. "It creates the surrounding for the actors by making it real and pulling the play all together. I didn't notice this until last night when we put up all the flags. All the actors were so excited."

Wildcats contribute to Big 8's rich history

Saturday's match-up between K-State and Colorado will mark the Wildcats' final game in the Big 8 Conference.

The Big 8 was formed Jan. 12, 1907, as the Missouri Valley Intercollegiate Athletic Conference, consisting of Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa and Washington University of St. Louis. Ames College (Iowa State) and Drake joined two months later.

After the departure of Iowa, K-State became a member of the conference in 1913.

Other schools came and went in the ensuing years, with Iowa State, Kansas, K-State, Missouri, Nebraska and Oklahoma creating the Big 6 in 1928. Colorado left the Skyline Conference to make it seven in 1947, with Oklahoma State adding the final piece in 1957.

The Big 8 has won more than its share of football glory, from the NCAA-record 47-game winning streak of the Oklahoma Sooners (1953-57) to national championships won or shared by three league teams in the last 10 years.

No other conference can boast of more outstanding players and coaches — from the "Kansas Comet" Gayle Sayers to Colorado running back and Heisman winner Rashaan Salaam, and from Sooner coach Bud Wilkinson to Nebraska's Tom Osborne, recently chosen as the Associated Press' all-time Big 8 coach.

K-State is wrapped up in that history. Former Cat Chad May has league records for single-game passing yards (489), consecutive games with a touchdown pass (15) and consecutive passes without an interception (148).

And quarterback Matt Miller has the record for touchdown passes in a season — a record he is sure to improve on Saturday.

So remember your Wildcat-Big 8 history Saturday. The cameras of ABC Sports will be rolling, and so will the Cats. This is not a time for the goalposts to come down.

It's a time for all Cats to stand tall.

God offers chance to change your life

Kevyn Jacobs' Oct. 30 column, "Pagan Beliefs Make a Comeback," was informative and interesting. I thank Jacobs for his ability to put into words his feelings and opinions, especially with regard to witchcraft and paganism in relationship to Christianity. But, as always, it was only half the story.

Do you really expect us to believe these beliefs are making a comeback?

They have never left! I admit it was indeed an atrocity that many people, whether labeled correctly or incorrectly as witches and/or pagans, were burned for their beliefs or because suspicion and fear surround their beliefs.

It was wrong. It was then and would be today.

A lot of these people probably were not witches, but faith healers and believers of natural medicines, as Jacobs asserts.

However, Jacobs neglects to mention, and maybe he doesn't even know, that just about all groups of peoples on this earth have been persecuted at one time or another — not just queers, pagans and other groups he focuses on.

Christians in the early times were persecuted and tortured as well — no one cries and raises a ruckus about that.

And what about Christ himself? He willingly allowed himself to be persecuted and killed so that the gap between sinful humankind and God Almighty could be closed, but only if people accept that gift and follow him.

Other persecuted early Christians included Stephen, Peter and John the Baptist. Christ told his disciples in John 15:20 that if society persecuted him, it would surely persecute those who followed him.

The apostle Paul (formerly Saul) was killed ... he knew he would pay dearly for his love for Jesus, but he did not waver. Instead of whining about how he had such a tough time, he rejoiced in the knowledge he would be with his Lord. Because of his spiritual maturity, we have many wonderful New Testament books that are so essential to the Christian life.

Why did Paul rejoice in the midst of his turmoil? He was indeed human; he talks about it in the writings he left behind. But he knew his earthly life was only temporary. Christ is eternal. Paul knew he needed to grab hold of God and God's Holy Spirit to see change in his life. Ironically, God used this former persecutor of Christ himself to be one of the world's best witnesses.

Jesus appeared to Saul on the road to Damascus and asked him why he did such evil things. If Saul could be saved and converted to serve Jesus so many centuries ago, we sinful people today can be saved as well.

We are all Sauls; we all need cleansing. I certainly did when I found the Lord five years ago, and I still need daily cleansing to set my heart straight before God each and every day. I am no better or worse than anyone else, but I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me (Philippians 4:13).

I do not endorse witchcraft, earth-centered religions or other such things, but I do recognize their right in the United States to exist and practice their beliefs and rituals, as long as they do not hurt anyone else, just as I as a Christian should not hurt others.

There is one big difference these practices are clearly against scripture. People don't want to see these lifestyle choices as evil, just as Christ said in John 3:19.

And this is the condemnation, that the light (Jesus himself) has come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. Everyone practicing evil hates the light and does not come to the light, lest his deeds should be exposed.

When we are guilty, we are like children who do not want their parents to find out what they have done. We run, we try to hide our failures, sins and such, but they still exist.

We try to explain away our sins with statements like, "I was born this way, it's genetic." "I came from a dysfunctional family," "I was impoverished" or "I should be able to do whatever I want to — it's my right!"

When people meet God, their eyes are opened, and they see these are just excuses and lies that kept them from God.

God knows all. He knew we weren't capable of correcting sins ourselves, that is why there is Jesus. Not accepting Jesus as Lord does not invalidate the truth that he is.

God has a divine design, and He wants every single person to be a part of it. Failure to be included isn't his fault ... we have the right to choose. Before you reject Jesus, read his book, pray and ask God to reveal His truth to you.

Keeping yourself entertained during a

Lonely Thanksgiving

Fall break is finally close at hand and not a second too soon. Another week or two of this routine, and many of us would have gnawed off a limb in a vain effort to escape with our lives.

The last school holiday we had was Sept. 4, which was Labor Day. I have fond memories of that one day of rest and relaxation before the hell of the weeks that followed.

Since then, I have to tell you, most people I know are such stress balls they could knit themselves into a sweater.

"Just a few more days" has become a mantra. I've heard it repeated again and again from Thompson Hall to Ackert Hall. "Just a few more days and soon this will all be an unhappy memory."

By next Tuesday, most of us will be heading home toward Aunt Rose's cranberry sauce and Grandma's green bean salad, made from a recipe she's had since 1922 (and tastes like it).

We'll start watching television again, and our laundry will be magically done by that mythical creature called Mom. We'll belly up to the table, surrounded by our loved ones to give thanks for the many gifts we have received during the last year and then eat ourselves sick.

There are some of us who won't be going home, of course. There are those of us who will probably be spending Thanksgiving Day standing over our kitchen sinks with a frozen dinner, thanking God for the invention of the microwave.

We pathetic few, myself included, who will be here in Manhattan during the fall vacation alone with nothing to do but our homework.

It seems an exaggerated and grim picture, but actually, Manhattan isn't all that bad during breaks. You'd be surprised how quiet and calm this place is when bereft of its students.

Suddenly, there are plenty of parking places, lines are shorter all over town and you don't have to worry about finding a man half-naked and urinating in your front yard on Saturday night.

When I asked myself what I could do while I was in Manhattan during the break by myself, the first response that came to mind was "go crazy," but once I put my mind to it, I came up with a few ideas that should keep me and anyone else out there who will be a vacation orphan, occupied for the vacation time.

After finishing my dismal dinner (Spaghetti-Os and stuffing is on the menu if anyone would like to join me), I thought about running naked through the deserted K-State Student Union parking lot screaming "It's all mine!" Of course, with the nippy weather we've been having, you probably won't want to follow my example.

Not only because of the weather. I could probably be arrested for most of these activities under some statute or another. We'd have to be especially careful now that most of the students will be out of town because the police will be even more vigilant than they normally are (snort, giggle).

After running through the Union parking lot, I thought about browsing in Wal-Mart. Not to buy anything — just to look and enjoy the complete transcendent peacefulness of standing in line and getting through it sometime before the end of the turn of the century.

If you've ever known this joy before, you might never get over the novelty of it, so don't do this unless you are prepared to be denied the pleasure again for a very long time.

Then I thought I'd rent a whole stack of foreign films and drink my way through the alphabet, making up my own subtitles for them as I go along. I like to do that with home movies and hand puppets. (We all have to have a hobby.)

That is also an excellent preliminary activity for spending the rest of vacation in the emergency room with alcohol poisoning.

And of course, if you ever get truly bored, there is always the good old standby of sleeping through it. Sleep through the whole week? Yes, it is possible. I could do it with one eyelid tied behind my back.

And there is always homework. I think it's probably bad luck to bring up the fact that there is a little less than 2-1/2 weeks left in the semester after the break. This may be the perfect time to spend it getting ready for finals week.

Nah.

► SIGMA KAPPA CHARITY

Editor,

Is beer your first thought when you think of commemorating the holiday season?

Maybe you don't celebrate because you might grab too many munchies!

We all have common traditions when this season rolls around. Whether we trudge through the snow to visit our families or just sit at home in front of the fireplace, everyone enjoys that toasty feeling in the middle of the chilly winter.

Sigma Kappa sorority starts off the holiday season by celebrating in another way.

During the week of Nov. 11-18, Sigma Kappa members donate their time and effort during their annual Week of Giving.

This week, started in the early 1900s, was designed to help charities call philanthropies.

Sigma Kappa's philanthropies include Alzheimer's research, Inherit the Earth, gerontology and the Maine Seacoast Mission.

During the Week of Giving, Sigma Kappa members do a project for each philanthropy.

Members visit with the senior citizens and assist the elderly in the county. This includes cleaning their yards and doing environmental work, called Inherit the Earth Project.

In the K-State Student Union this week, members will be selling lollipops. The money raised is used for Alzheimer's research.

Later in the week, members pick up distributed boxes for their Maine Seacoast Mission.

Every day has a special meaning and is in celebration of the week. There is a sisterhood day, a greek day and a campus day worked into the community service activities.

The Sigma Kappa members give not only to the needy during the Week of Giving, but also to K-State. Members gave violets to show appreciation to others starting off this holiday season.

The Week of Giving is designed for people to be conscious of others' needs. Sigma Kappas are educated on who they are helping out in the community and where the money goes.

The less fortunate benefit so much from all those that give just a little of what they have.

The Week of Giving exists strongly in the hearts of Sigma Kappas around the world. We all must keep in mind that we shouldn't just give during this week. It is a year-round commitment.

I believe this article shows K-State, both students and staff, just how important giving is during the holidays.

I think some students hold a grudge against the greek system around the United States.

This letter will hopefully break some of the greek stereotypes I hear around campus.

► GOD AND HOMOSEXUALS

Editor,

Over the past several weeks since National Coming Out Day, there have been many articles written about the compatibility of homosexuality and Christianity.

This is not at all possible. In fact, the Bible directly condemns homosexuality. First, some clarifications are needed.

A Christian by definition is someone who is Christlike. Therefore, a Christian obeys His (God's) Holy Word. For the Word, in fact, is God (John 1:1).

The word of God states homosexuality is morally wrong (1 Corinthians 6:9, Romans 1:25-27, etc.). Therefore, Christians are not homosexuals.

Furthermore, Christians are instructed to hate sin with a passion yet love the sinner with that same passion. Therefore, we cannot be judgmental of homosexuals, but we must condemn their activity.

I encourage all Christians to stand firm in the word, for we are children of the word himself. I also encourage all those who will not believe and obey God's word not to call themselves Christians. First, they give real Christians a bad name. Secondly, it is better for them to be hot or cold than lukewarm in Christianity (Revelations 3:15-16).

Senate debates rules, by-laws definitions

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate voted on its own rules Thursday night.

An amendment to the standing rules changing the minimum number of debates on an issue before the question can be called failed on a vote of 4-37.

"After four, it gets redundant," said Michael Reilly, business senator and sponsor of the amendment.

"We could get out of here a lot quicker if we called it after four," he said. "A lot of people get up just to hear themselves speak."

Phil Anderson, faculty representative to Senate, said he agreed with the sentiment of the legislation but sometimes all the information has not been revealed after four debates.

"Although the system may be flawed, it's better than this," Anderson said.

Senate also voted on an amendment to the Student Governing Association by-laws defining a student-at-large.

Student-at-large is defined as a student who is not serving in an elected position within Senate, or is elected, appointed or approved by Senate.

Bill Muir, faculty representative to Senate, said the legislation did not apply to elected positions that are not in the legislative, executive or judicial branches of student government.

Student Publications, Fine Arts Council and Union Governing Board members are considered ineligible to serve in at-large positions, Muir said.

College council members are not members of the legislative branch even though they are elected at the same time, he said. Earlier in the semester, Senate rejected appointments to the Legal Services Advisory Board because a cabinet member had been appointed to an at-large position.

Five other appointments were approved that violated the amendment before the Legal Services appointment was presented for approval.

"That was ugly," Muir said. "This does what you wanted to have done."

The amendment has been rewritten three times to clarify the problems in selecting at-large students.

"Representation and getting more students involved is critical if we are to have a representative government on this campus," Jason Cole, arts and sciences senator, said.

In first readings, the allocation of Educational Opportunities Fund money was read. A total of $223,390 would be allocated to 23 of the 40 groups requesting funds. A total of $401,960 was requested by the 40 groups.

Another amendment to the standing rules was given first readings.

Reilly and Drew Wallace, business senator, proposed an amendment that would prohibit roll calls during the final open period.

Wallace and Reilly also proposed a resolution in support of the consumption of alcohol in the parking lots at KSU Stadium.

In other business, two new senators were approved and sworn in. Rebecca Miller will represent the graduate school, and Jawwad Abdulhaqq will represent arts and sciences.

ELECTIONS

would also be sent to the Collegian.

Phil Anderson, faculty representative to Senate, proposed an amendment that would take out the section requiring Senate to approve violators by a two-thirds vote.

The amendment failed by a vote of 17-36.

"Campaign violations have already been publicized in the Collegian, so the electorate is already aware of them," Anderson said. "I don't think this body has the right to override that decision."

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, said he thought the rules were not worth having if there were no way to enforce them.

"If we're going to have elections bills and tell people they have to follow them and then have no mechanism to enforce them, they're not worth the paper they're printed on," LeDoux said.

The Elections Committee also changed the polling places for the first day of the general election. On the Tuesday of the election, polls will be in the buildings where the college office is for each college on campus. Tuesday evening, the polls will be in the dining centers.

The polls will be in the K-State Student Union on the Wednesday of the election.

Almost all the college councils will have their elections during the general elections for the first time this year. The colleges of Arts and Sciences and Agriculture have already been having elections with the general election.

Another change was prompted by letters from administrators concerning the appearance of campus during elections.

Instead of thin paper, candidates will be encouraged to use a stock paper of at least 110-pound weight.

"Stock is just a technical term for thicker paper," Schneider said.

The campus looks really bad during elections because candidates for Senate and the college councils use a lighter paper than the student body president and vice president candidates.

The thinner paper is easily torn off trees and light poles, and clutters the campus, he said.

"We have a really good deal with the Union Copy Center for 10 cents a copy," Schneider said.

The amount of money candidates could spend was the main issue for the 1994-95 election guidelines debate. Student Body President Jeff Peterson vetoed the regulations before semester break, and Senate had to approve a different set of guidelines for the April '95 election.

Last year, candidates for student body president and vice president were allowed to spend 100 percent of tuition of a full-time, in-state undergraduate student for that semester.

The Elections Committee changed that this year and made it clear how much money student body president and vice president candidates could spend in the general and run-off elections.

"Last year, it was unclear how much money student body president candidates could spend in the runoff election," Schneider said.

Under the 1995-96 regulations, student body president and vice president candidates can spend up to 75 percent of tuition for a full-time, in-state undergraduate student in the general election and the other 25 percent in the run-off election.

All other campuswide candidates for Fine Arts Council, Board of Student Publications and Union Governing Board positions can spend up to 75 percent of the tuition paid by a full-time, in-state student that semester.

Senate and college council candidates can spend 10 percent of the same tuition figure.

Pella Window is next challenge for Wildcats

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

With the season opener against Bradley University a week away, K-State hopes its play is a little more crisp in its exhibition finale against Pella Window at 8 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

Pella Window is a touring team out of Iowa that includes several Big 8 players from Iowa State, Nebraska and Colorado.

Last week against Zagreb, the Wildcats looked good at times, bad at times and like a team playing its first game of the season most of the time.

"We've been working hard in practice, but it was our first time in front of the big crowd, and we made a lot of mistakes that we usually don't make in practice," forward Mark Young said. "I would say we expected to make them. It's better to make them now than during the season."

In the 74-61 win last week, K-State shot 47 percent from the field and didn't look sloppy. Much of that has to do with the fact K-State coaches got to work with players in groups of three for several hours a week once school started.

"That's provided us with an opportunity to get a feel for these guys that we could not have done previously," Coach Tom Asbury said before practice started. "It's been tremendous for us because we start school so early — we were able to have seven weeks of that."

Preseason workouts and a month of practice helped alleviate the early mistakes six new players can make.

"We had the best scenario imaginable in the sense that we had six new players and five second-year players in a year where we can work with them on an individual basis," Asbury said. "They (the NCAA) timed it well. It's a great rule."

In the pre-practice workouts, conditioning wasn't an issue. The coaching staff got a headstart in teaching the new players.

"We didn't do any conditioning," Asbury said. "We had plenty of conditioning outside of that, but we did all teaching. We talked a lot of terminology, skill improvement and a lot of defense — we talked a lot about how to defend in certain situations."

The three-player groups consisted of those who play the same position — a group of guards, a section of forwards and so on.

"We talked about putting a point guard, a small forward and a center together, but we never did get to do that," Asbury said. "We felt like we needed skill development and to teach them terminology."

Several of the newcomers showed the sparse crowd of 3,418 last week what they could do. Gerald Eaker and Anton Hubert each started while Johnnie Williams, Paco May, Shawn Rhodes and Manny Dies saw significant minutes off the bench. The six combined for 36 points and 18 rebounds.

Asbury wanted to see the newcomers instead of veterans Elliot Hatcher and captain Tyrone Davis. Those two each played 19 minutes.

"I wasn't real concerned with those guys," Asbury said. "In terms of playing time, I know what they can do."

► WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Wildcats play Portuguese team in exhibition game

Dan Lewerenz
sports editor

K-State's women's basketball team gets its final dry run before the regular season tonight when they take on the Portuguese National Team. Tipoff is at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum, and students are admitted free with a valid student ID.

Wildcat coach Brian Agler said he was unfamiliar with the Portuguese team.

"I really don't know a lot about them," Agler said.

"They've played a couple games in the last few days, and they're picking up two of their better players at the airport on the way here. So they should be even better than they have been."

And though Agler might not know the particulars of the Portuguese team, it will probably be like most other European teams in many ways, he said.

"They're probably going to be a half-court team both offensively and defensively," Agler said. "They'll have good size, pass well, shoot well and generally execute pretty well — typical of a European team."

Unlike teams the Cats will face when they open their season later this month, the Portuguese team will have played together for some time. And Agler said that experience would help his team.

"It will really challenge our defense. And with the size they'll probably have, it'll give our team the chance to practice playing against bigger teams like we'll have to during the season."

Despite their size disadvantage, two of K-State's top three scorers in their last exhibition game were post players, juniors Carrie Ragar, with 15 points, and Kayla Hester, with 10 points. Sophomore Brit Jacobson contributed 13 points from the wing, junior wing Missy Decker added eight, and junior post Andria Jones had eight points while leading the team in rebounds with 13.

The team has improved since their last outing, a 65-64 loss to Athletes in Action, Agler said.

"I hope we can see some improvement in our execution since a week ago," Agler said.

"We've emphasized our half-court offense and half-court defense, and we've worked on our zone defense, which you didn't see a lot of last game."

"So hopefully, we'll execute those things better."

Though Ragar led the team in scoring, Agler said he would probably keep his starting lineup of Jacobson, Decker, Jones, junior Kjersten Larson and sophomore Amanda Chamberlain.

Cats to face talented CU receivers

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

No. 9 Colorado (8-2) brings a skilled group of receivers to face No. 7-K-State (9-1) at 2:30 p.m. Saturday.

Colorado wide receivers Ray Carruth and Phil Savoy represent the best and fastest group the Wildcats will face this season.

Carruth, a junior, made 28 catches in his first two seasons, but this season, as the main man in Coach Rick Neuheisel's passing offense, Carruth has exploded, making 46 catches for 924 yards and nine touchdowns.

"I can say he certainly ranks as one of the fastest we'll face," Cat cornerback Joe Gordon said. "He's a guy that possesses a lot of speed, and they like to give him the ball deep, so it'll be a challenge."

Although Carruth is listed at 5 feet 11 inches and 190 pounds, he is a physical wideout.

"He's pretty physical for his size," Gordon said. "He likes to muscle you a little bit, and then once he muscles you, he likes to run away. He's tried to pickup on Westbrook's style."

"He's not very big, but he's not very small, either," he said.

Gordon and fellow cornerback Chris Canty will start off man-to-man and most likely stay there.

"You haven't seen us back off much at all," co-defensive coordinator Bob Stoops said. "We're always uptight — it doesn't matter who we're playing. They'd rather be nose-to-nose than anywhere."

Although K-State will stay with man-to-man coverage, Gordon said corners could change their strategy after the first couple series.

"It depends on the DB," Gordon said. "It depends on what he feels comfortable with. Personally, I feel you have to do whatever you can to stop them, and that's something you normally gauge during the ball game. You can tell if you're playing too close or too loose and you can make those adjustments."

"After the first three or four snaps, it's something you can get the feel on what to expect for the rest of the game," he said.

For Canty, speed has nothing to do with it — just playing sound, fundamental football is the best way to stop a receiver.

"Each and every week, our defense is man-to-man coverage, and I'll just go out and play technique football," he said. "I don't really look at speed too much. I know there's some great receivers in the Big 8, and Carruth is one of them."

Colorado will use its speed on the perimeter to go for the long ball on several occasions, and players have connected most of the time. This season, the Buffaloes have had completions of 89, 77, 52, 50 and 44 yards.

"Deep for them gets them to the end zone quicker than deep for us," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "We throw deep, too, but they go deeper."

Receivers can have all of the speed in the world, but they need a quarterback who can get them the ball. And in Koy Detmer, Colorado had a proven passer. But after he went down with a knee injury, John Hessler has filled the role, passing for 1,822 yards and a school-record 18 touchdowns.

"Many people doubt what he can do, but obviously, he's stepped in, and Colorado is 8-2 right now," Canty said of Hessler. "He runs the offense pretty well, and he's getting the job done."

Herchell Troutman has rushed for 740 yards and five touchdowns this season. Lendon Henry and Marlon Barnes have combined for more than 800 yards and 10 touchdowns.

"They got some balance," Snyder said. "They run the ball better than some people acknowledge."

With a solid effort against the Buffs, K-State will be able to call itself the best defense in the country.

"We have to play like we're No. 1 on Saturday," linebacker Percell Gaskins said. "Since the Nebraska game, we've been playing lights out on defense."

► VOLLEYBALL

K-State closes regular season at Colorado

Shana Newell
staff writer

The K-State volleyball team is 19-9 for the season and hopes its record is impressive enough to sway NCAA voters next week.

Those 19 wins include an early-season home match against the then-No. 16 Colorado Buffaloes.

Six of the Wildcat losses and only three of the wins came on the road. Following Saturday night's battle in Boulder, the Cats will need to be 4-6 in order to fulfill any NCAA tournament hopes.

"Our only chance is to beat Colorado," Coach Jim Moore said.

K-State will travel west after a Wednesday night outing at Oral Roberts University. The Cats lost to the Golden Eagles in a 3-0 match that might have diminished their tournament invitation potential.

Moore said the loss could be attributed to the superiority of Oral Roberts over K-State.

"They played really well," he said. "We didn't play so well."

The Cats stayed alive against the Eagles with the performance of senior hitter Jill Dugan.

Dugan recorded 12 kills and only two errors in Wednesday's loss, hitting .333. She also had four digs against Oral Roberts.

"Jill played very well in that match. I thought she did very good," Moore said.

The Cats were without the offensive power of middle blocker Val Wieck.

Although Wieck has been able to practice with the Cats following an emergency appendectomy last week, that practice has been limited.

"I practiced a little bit to get into the swing of things," Wieck said.

"I'm going to practice a little more each day to see how I do and go from there."

Moore said it was questionable whether Wieck would play against the Buffaloes Saturday night.

"I highly doubt that she plays," Moore said. "But if she does, I'm sure that it will be in a very limited role."

At the same time the Cats were struggling with the Eagles, Colorado was busy defeating Oklahoma.

With the Buffaloes' victory, Colorado will finish in fourth place in the conference. K-State will have to settle for fifth place.

Because only the top four conference teams earn berths in the Big 8 tournament next week, K-State's hopes of attending the tourney were dashed by the Colorado win.

If K-State does not defeat Colorado, Moore said the team might still have an opportunity to participate in the NIVC tournament in Kansas City, Mo., the first week of December. The NIVC tourney is the equivalent to college basketball's postseason NIT tournament.

MOVIE REVIEW

'Powder' strays from sci-fi premise into world o' corn

Claudette Riley
staff writer

In "Powder," a seemingly unnatural being is the antagonist of humanity for residents of a small Texas county.

Powder, an albino played by Sean Patrick Flanery, was abandoned by his father after his mother was killed by lightning. He moves to his grandparents' cellar, where he is self-schooled until their deaths.

Flanery plays Powder with a knowing, unassuming gentleness and compassion that evolves as the audience learns more about his condition.

Writer and director Victor Salva seems to suggest that Powder's abnormally rapid brain waves, attraction of pure energy and mind control of inanimate objects is due to his neonatal lightning electrocution.

Scared by early abandonment, Powder only experienced the world through reading and his grandparents.

Learning about the misery, tragedy and reality of the dark world makes him long for the isolation of the cellar and the security of the womb, before he was jarred from both.

Powder is then found by psychologist Jessie Caldwell, played by Mary Steenbergen, and brought to the state boys' home she runs.

Regarded as retarded or deformed, Powder is taunted by classmates as a phantom from outer space, a cancer camp escapee, a boogie man and a freak.

The magnitude of Powder's pull on any form of energy in an immediate radius is discovered by science teacher Mr. Ripley, played by Jeff Goldblum.

Dumbfounded and transformed by what he sees, smartly played Goldblum proposes that Powder is a higher link in the constantly relaying, transforming and never-ending energy cycle.

Human contact and touching between Powder and Goldblum also moves Goldblum to suppose that Powder is the evolved man. Employing Einstein's theory, he further pontificates that Powder is reaching the level of pure energy because he is able to use a significantly larger portion of his brain.

After Powder scores off the scale in the I.Q. genius classification, the movie asks for another generous, leaping suspension of disbelief.

Apparently, the pre-birth electrocution also allows Powder to listen to others' thoughts and feelings from places they didn't even know could think.

"Powder" then begins covering as many politically correct hot spots as possible in a two-hour movie.

"Powder" shows that if a hunter could understand the full pain he inflicts on his hunted prey, he would mend his ways and rid his world of all guns.

Further statements expound on the value of deeply intelligent and connected romantic love, which transcends physical beauty and bigotry.

The movie should have never strayed from its brilliant premise that each person is part of everything and everybody.

Enlightenment rings from learning that we are not disconnected, beauty exists everywhere and sarcasm and deception should not be used to confuse the truth.

Though touching, only parts of this movie support its hope that one day humanity will surpass technology.

REGENTS

At the regents' retreat this fall, the board members agreed to work toward a proposal that would prepare the regents' system for the 21st century. The result was the Vision 2020 report.

The proposal addresses the need of both short-term and long-term changes in the regents' system.

The report stated the regents would try to set goals, increase efficiency and improve reporting procedures.

The draft proposal includes reevaluation of curriculum, evaluation of providing ways to reward faculty and development of initiatives to optimize financial resources, including tuition accountability.

The report also stated the board would analyze faculty time. Faculty have said they want to evaluate the time teachers spend researching as opposed to teaching.

A report was presented to the board in October that stated faculty at regents schools said too much emphasis and rewards were placed on research over teaching.

K-State president Jon Wefald said he supported the changes outlined in the proposal.

"I think the answer is that it's in our best interest to do it," he said.

"I don't see how we can survive in the 21st century if we don't."

Wefald said regardless of what the Kansas Legislature does, it was necessary for the regents to adopt portions of the proposals.

Wefald said the board could adopt the curriculum review, faculty time review and administrative reorganization proposals.

He said many of the items in the proposal were already being done at some of the regents universities.

"Is our curriculum ready for the 21st century? Maybe yes, maybe no," Wefald said.

"We should do this regardless but make sure the Legislature is behind us."

The board also approved a renewal of an agreement concerning transfer credits from Kansas community colleges.

Students transferring to regents schools with associate's degrees from Kansas community colleges will still receive junior status — at least until June 1996.

According to an agreement between the regents and the community colleges, transfer students who have earned associate's degrees from Kansas public community colleges will be exempt from taking general-education requirement classes.

The Kansas Council on the Future of Post Secondary Education, established by the Legislature, will review transfer and articulation issues and report to the governor and Legislature in August 1996.

In other business, the board granted permission to K-State to renovate its motor-pool garage adjacent to the physics department shops in Cardwell Hall for use as a high-energy physics construction and testing facility.

The $12-million structure will be used for high-energy experiments throughout the United States.

Vacating and renovating the motor-pool facility is estimated to cost $225,000. Another $50,000 will be required to relocate the motor pool.

The project is being paid for by research overhead funds and other restricted-use funds.

Bowl questions linger

Todd Stewart

assistant sports editor

OK, so Colorado shattered K-State's dreams of the Cotton Bowl. But where now?

"It's a cross-state rivalry to see who goes to our bowl," Weldon Donaldson, selection committee chair for the Holiday Bowl, said.

Donaldson said after K-State's 27-17 loss to Colorado that the Big 12 conference representative to the Holiday Bowl will be either of two 9-2 teams, Kansas or K-State.

He said it was the new Associated Press and USA Today/Coaches' Poll rankings that would be the deciding factor for the bowl.

"I think that's what's going to break the tie," Donaldson said.

When the polls came out yesterday morning, the Wildcats were No. 10 in both polls, while the Jayhawks were No. 11 in the AP poll and No. 14 in the coaches' poll.

All of which would point to the Cats, a team Donaldson never dreamed the Holiday Bowl would have a chance at.

"We didn't think we had a shot at K-State," Donaldson said.

Should the Holiday Bowl select the Cats, the Cats would face either the WAC champion or the second-place team in the PAC-10, whichever of the two the Cotton Bowl does not pick up.

With the PAC-10 choice offering the higher-ranked team, the best bet for the Holiday Bowl would be the Cats versus the WAC champion.

So, who's going to win the WAC?

As of today, Utah leads the conference with a 6-2 in conference mark, but San Diego State, Colorado State, Air Force and BYU are all right behind with a conference mark of 5-2, so the WAC champion is still up in the air.

After Saturday's game, however-

Pep rally pumps up Wildcat fans for last Big 8 game

J. Scot

staff writer

K-State football fans were out in Aggieville Friday night to show their support for the Wildcats. The pep rally was aired on ABC Sports.

Donald and JoAnn Scott drove more than 300 miles from Goodland to see K-State play its final Big 8 game.

"We have just been K-State fans for a long time," JoAnn Scott said.

Donald was on K-State's football team from 1947-48 during the Big 6 era, she said.

"After the KU game, I talked with Coach Snyder and told him I must have died and gone to heaven," Donald Scott said.

JoAnn said her husband has taken teasing and given a hard time for wearing his K-State T-shirts.

"And look at K-State now," she said. Some of the students in attendance thought the pep rally was a great idea.

After the pep rally, fans loaded up on K-State memorabilia at the Ballard's Sporting Goods booth.

Kelli Cooper, freshman in nutrition and exercise science, said she bought four K-State T-shirts to show her support and spirit for K-State.

Cooper said the fans showed a lot of spirit at the pep rally.

"I have never seen such support," she said.

Prizes donated by Ballard's, Lucky Brew

Grille and Classic Tours were given away to those who showed their Wildcat Pride.

Chad Weinand, senior in landscape architecture, who was covered in cotton balls and wore a pair of cotton briefs on his head, won the craziest Wildcat outfit and a K-State starter jacket.

The best ABC banner read 'Aggieville Backs the Cats as They Bash Colorado and Are Bound for the Cotton Bowl.' It was designed by Michelle Bartow, senior in advertising, Sean Ryland, junior in computer engineering, and Matt Taylor, freshman in kinesiology, and they won a bus trip for four to whatever bowl game K-State plays in. Phi Gamma Delta and Chi Omega won a tailgate party for being the largest groups in attendance.

Duo plays benefit concert

Claudette Riley

staff writer

Revamping the idea of making a joyful noise unto the Lord, Lost and Found rocked All Faiths Chapel Sunday night.

Michael Bridges and George Baum began performing together after a 1986 trip during which they rode their bikes from New York to St. Louis to Miami to San Diego to Seattle and back to New York.

In 11-1/2 months, they covered 8,500 miles and played 270 concerts.

Based out of Los Angeles and Ohio, Lost and Found performs about 150 concerts each year in the United States and Canada.

The group's musical style has been described as "acoustic thrash."

Jayne Thompson, Lutheran campus minister, orchestrated the concert to benefit the new acquisition of Luther House at the corner of Anderson and Denison avenues.

"It's their first, and hopefully annual, visit to K-State," Thompson said.

Thompson met the two musicians in 1989 while leading a worship service in Florida.

Bridges and Baum have an incredible gift for doing music that is interactive for young people, Thompson said.

"I've had some of my youth-group members feel literally transformed," she said.

Lyrics that touch on depression, relationships, anorexia and rumors all emphasize the importance of God's love, Thompson said.

"They don't call themselves Christian musicians, but they are Christian guys who like to play good music," Thompson said.

"I think if we have a group of not only Lutheran young people, but also people from other religious groups, feel touched or uplifted in their lives, then I'll be thrilled."

Jill Riley, senior in finance,

► THANKSGIVING BREAK

Holiday activities offered to students

Katie Thomas

staff reporter

While most students are leaving Manhattan for Thanksgiving break, some will be staying in town.

And for those in town, plenty of shopping, craft shows and festivals are waiting for them.

The Holiday Music Festival will begin Nov. 18 and last until Dec. 24 at Manhattan Town Center. Shannon Maddox, marketing/advertising director at the mall, said.

"We have Santa who arrives on the 18th of November and will be here through the Thanksgiving weekend," Maddox said.

The festival invites groups from the community to sing carols during all mall hours, she said.

The Holiday Fashion Show will take place at 1 p.m. and 3 p.m. on Nov. 25 and at 2 p.m. on Nov. 26 at the mall.

Across town, the Homemade for the Holidays Craft Show will take place from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Nov. 25 at Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park, said Diana Skirvin, administrative assistant at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Sixty crafters will display their hand-made items. This is the 11th year of the festival, Hazel Roberts, co-coordinator for the craft show, said.

"If you're shopping for gifts, it's the ideal place to get special, one-of-a-kind gifts," Roberts said.

The crafters will have jewelry, stained glass, crochets and other craft items to sell, she said.

"You name it, it's there. We think we have a pretty good show," Roberts said.

News Digest

► BATTERY CHARGES DROPPED AGAINST BASKETBALL PLAYER

K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury has made an official statement concerning player Anton Hubert, who was arrested Nov. 10 for the alleged battery of his girlfriend:

"I've spoken with Anton and his girlfriend, and both of them have assured me that he did not lay a hand on her. There was no abuse, no charges have been filed, and the case has been dropped.

"Basically, the whole situation was a big misunderstanding and his girlfriend is writing a letter to the K-State Collegian that will hopefully put the rumors to rest. It's unfortunate that an arrest was made in this case, but I'm certain that Anton didn't do anything wrong," Asbury said.

STUDENTS CAN WATCH REVIEW SESSIONS IN THE COMFORT OF HOME

Some instructors are making it easier for students to review for tests with the help of public access television.

Students at K-State are benefiting from review sessions broadcast from Dole Hall.

The review sessions are broadcast on channel 21 and on cable channel 19. Instructors tell students when these sessions will occur usually in class or in their syllabi.

Teachers have the review sessions in a classroom studio at Dole. A team of two students help produce the sessions.

Students are then able to view the review sessions from the comfort of their homes. Sessions are on various evenings between 7 and 10 p.m.

Dave Deitch, associate director of operations for the Educational Communications Center, said some students might not otherwise be able to go to the study session if they are not on campus in the evening.

Those students who are on campus can come into the classroom with the teacher during the review session.

Trevor Standish, freshman in pre-medicine, said his fraternity house doesn't get the review sessions, but he heard they were available on tapes.

Some chemistry, sociology, economics and family nutrition classes are offering television review sessions this semester.

Maria Paukstelis, instructor and director of academic services in the chemistry department, said her Chemistry 1 classes have review sessions once a week.

Paukstelis said she thought the review sessions were beneficial.

"When we started, we had a ten-fold increase of people turning into reviews," Paukstelis said.

Paukstelis said many of her students either watch the review sessions on television or watch the tapes.

"I would say at least two-thirds of them watch it," Paukstelis said.

Anna Lenhart, junior in history and pre-health professions, said the review sessions helped her get a feel for the format and problems on the next test.

"It's a really good review. She goes over old problems," Lenhart said.

Douglas Lacy, sophomore in architectural engineering, said he had watched once, but he found the lectures more helpful.

Cindy Jeffrey, associate producer director at the center, said the response from students has been positive. Administrators and people doing it are pleased with the results, she said.

CHINESE RELATIONS STABLE

OSAKA, Japan (AP)

—U.S.-China relations are back to normal after a summer of strife, Chinese President Jiang Zemin said Saturday after talks with Vice President Al Gore.

In meetings with six other leaders before Sunday's Pacific Rim economic summit, Jiang also sought to defuse tensions with the Philippines in the South China Sea, demanded Japan apologize for World War II, and promised that China's economic development would make the world safer.

Washington has refused Jiang an invitation for an official visit to the United States, saying relations are not good enough to merit one.

But Jiang talked with President Clinton at the United Nations in New York last month and was to meet with him again at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit. Clinton canceled the Japan trip to deal with the U.S. budget crisis, and Jiang saw Gore.

Jiang seemed pleased with his talks with Gore, according to a summary by spokesman Chen Jian.

Gore said the New York meeting was a breakthrough, and that U.S. policy toward China was one of engagement, not confrontation, Chen said.

BALKAN LEADERS NEGOTIATE

DAYTON, Ohio (AP)

—Balkan leaders had marathon talks Saturday with Secretary of State Warren Christopher as Bosnia's foreign minister quit and a U.S. spokesman declared that negotiations to end a 43-month war remain balanced on a knife's edge.

Amid speculation that a deal to be sealed by President Clinton was within reach, there was a stream of disclaimers from the State Department spokesman.

"We are still not on the verge of an agreement," Nicholas Burns said at day's end. "They clearly are not there."

With the assertion, the spokesman blended in what also has become a redundant admonition that the talks can't go on forever.

Christopher and chief U.S. mediator Richard Holbrooke took turns trying to bridge differences on issues among the Serbian, Bosnian and Croatian delegations.

Their aim was a comprehensive accord, not a piecemeal agreement, to be initiated here if the talks succeeded and formally signed at an international conference in Europe.

The unresolved issues included the scope of two proposed ethnic republics and whether Bosnian Serbs would gain control of part of Sarajevo, the Bosnian capital.

United Way looks for community heroes

Jeremy Crabtree
staff reporter

United Way of Riley County has arranged for the distribution of the official entry forms for the 1996 Olympic Community Hero Torchbearer program.

The Community Hero Torchbearer program allows people who have performed outstanding volunteer work, served as a community leader, performed an act of kindness or performed extraordinary feats to be rewarded with a chance to carry the 1996 Olympic Torch when it passes through Kansas.

"A community hero is anyone who stands above and beyond in service-related areas," said Aileen Cray, executive director of the United Way of Riley County.

"You can give them a chance to be recognized by nominating them to carry the Olympic torch on its way to the 1996 Olympic games in Atlanta."

Cray said people can be nominated, or they can nominate themselves by filling out the application and writing a 100-word essay.

"The essay should describe why the nominee possesses the qualities of a community hero," Cray said, "or they can write the qualifications of the nominee on one side of a piece of paper and include it with the application."

The essays will be sent to a central collection point, sorted by zip code and sent to 147 community judging locations across the country.

Each location will have a judging panel made up of community leaders who will review and judge the entries.

"Our judging will be done in Topeka," Cray said. "They will be judged by people in our community. I encourage as many people that can to apply."

Cray said the torch will run through Kansas City, Kan., Topeka, Emporia and Wichita before it goes into Oklahoma.

"It's a great chance for people of our community to be part of this historic event. Especially since it comes so close to us," Cray said.

Community heroes needed to carry torch

The Community Hero Torchbearer program allows community heroes a chance to carry the 1996 Olympic Torch when it passes through Kansas.

The torch will run through Kansas City to Topeka, then to Emporia and through Wichita and out of Kansas into Oklahoma.

- Applications can be picked up between 9 a.m. and noon and from 1 to 5 p.m. at the United Way office at 106 S. 4th St.
- People can also call 1-800-4-96-COKE to receive an entry by mail. Entries must be postmarked by Nov. 30 and received by Dec. 8.

► INTERNATIONAL NIGHT

Cultures unite through song, folk dancing

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Colorful clothes, traditional songs and folk dances brought the world closer at International Night '95 Saturday.

Students performed popular dances to folk songs from Bangladesh, Pakistan, Costa Rica, Thailand, India and Puerto Rico.

Sarita Appachu, graduate student in architecture, performed a celebration dance with the India Students Association.

"I'm not from Gujarat, the part of India where this is popular. Dandia is a celebration dance, and when people see this dance, they just join in. Everyone starts to dance together," Appachu said.

The Thai Student Association performed Seung Kra Tib Kao, a folk dance from the northeastern part of Thailand. The song represents the importance of agriculture.

Chakrit Duangjai, graduate student in biochemistry, said the dance is usually performed in a mid-year festival.

"It talks about the sticky-rice sack, and this is something we use in everyday life and decorate with. The song that we always use is funny and beautiful at the same time," Duangjai said.

The Costa Rica Student Association performed El Punto Guanacasteco, a popular folkloric dance from a province in northern Costa Rica.

Victor Rodriguez, junior in hotel and restaurant management, said Puerto Rico Baila practiced a couple times each week to learn the three dances they performed.

Their final dance, El Merengue, is a tropical dance and popular in Rodriguez's native Dominican Republic.

"It expresses the reality of Latin American countries and translates into the cause of life. It is a funny, hopeful song because in our minds we are trying to forget the reality of our lives, that is our way," Rodriguez said.

The Bangladesh Student Association and Bangladesh students from surrounding elementary schools performed a dance that represents a deep love for the country's nature and art. The song, about unforgettably sweet memories, is accompanied by a the musical instrument called Dhol.

Quoc Nguyen, sophomore in journalism, said he came to experience the world and the characteristics of various nationalities.

"Every country, even as small as Sri Lanka, has cultural achievements such as dances, singing and various styles and fashions of dress," Nguyen said.

The solar plexus is a terrible thing to waste.

According to Isadora Duncan, a pioneer of modern dance from 1878 to 1927, it is where the soul lives.

Guest artist Patricia Adams, who has been touring the world with her interpretations of Duncan's work, has been a student of Duncan dance for 16 years.

Her home and her job is in Massachusetts, but because of her specialization in Duncan dance, she has been invited to K-State to help with production of WinterDance '95, an annual event presented by the K-State Dance Program and the Department of Speech, Communication, Theater and Dance.

Adams specializes in the Duncan-dance style, which is unique because of its focus on the solar plexus in the abdomen where the ribs come together.

"Nothing goes against nature. They are movements common to all people," Adams said.

The solar plexus is significant because it is where the movement is initiated. If you move your arm, for example, the movement starts with the body, not just the arm, Adams said.

Thirteen students will participate in a Duncan dance reconstructed by Adams.

Virginia Summers, a sophomore in biology, has attended the classes taught by Adams. "It made me appreciate a different style of dancing. It's more flowing," Summers said.

"In Duncan dance, dancers learn the reason behind each movement. Besides the steps, you learn the analogies of what your body is doing," Summers said.

Duncan's dance techniques are based on movement theories that propose all movement should start with the center of a person's being, the solar plexus. One of the most challenging problems is getting people to isolate and move from their solar plexus, Adams said.

Vera Orlock, assistant professor of speech, is a member of the dance faculty. Orlock said the Isadora Dance that will be presented at WinterDance is very attractive to the people viewing the dance.

"It draws the audience in. It looks like something you can do yourself," Adams said.

Adams said a classical background is useful in learning Duncan dance.

"It is important to have technique," Adams said.

Body awareness and strength are also vital in Duncan dance, Adams said.

Adams has taught Duncan dance in schools and theaters all across the United States and in Russia and England.

Anyone who gives the technique a chance will probably like it, she said.

WINTERDANCE

► WinterDance '95 will be presented at 8 p.m. Nov. 30 and Dec. 1 in Nichols Theatre and at a 2 p.m. matinee Dec. 2. Tickets may be purchased at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428. Tickets are $6 for students and senior citizens and $8 for the general public. A limited number of $2 tickets are available for elementary and secondary school students for the matinee.

"People, often times, don't know what Duncan technique is. They have preconceived ideas. Once people try it, they enjoy it and understand about subtlety and expression," Adams said.

Free Weight Training & Fitness Workshop

The LIFE center, KSU's community fitness program, and the Department of Kinesiology will present a free exercise and fitness clinic for students and community members Saturday, Dec. 2 at 1 PM in the Natatorium, Room 4.

FINE ARTS SPRING ALLOCATIONS REQUESTS

It is time for groups to submit applications for funding of events or projects for which you would like assistance from the Fine Arts Council. As you may or may not know, the Fine Arts Council was created by the Student Senate to establish more fine arts programming on campus. This money is generated from the Fine Arts privilege fee students pay each semester. A reserves account is created that assists in the programming efforts of student groups promoting fine-arts related programming.

The forms that need to be filled out are available at the OSAS Office. THE DEADLINE FOR APPLICATION IS ON OR BEFORE TUESDAY NOVEMBER 21, 1995 AT NOON (12 p.m.).

For more information, please call or go to the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Fall break brings relaxation

Have a good break. Get some rest and relaxation, and bring some leftovers back with you.

It wasn't an easy week. We took mind-boggling tests. We frantically finished loathsome group projects.

And we saw our football team fall to Colorado Saturday afternoon.

But in the spirit of Thanksgiving, we can be thankful.

We have to look a little harder than we'd like, but there are things to be thankful for.

1. The semester is almost over. After nearly a week-long break, the homework delinquents can return to class with all those late papers finally finished, and the truly diligent can take a breather.

2. We're being let out just long enough to stuff ourselves silly and sleep like the dead. Then we get to do it again in only three weeks.

3. We're going to a bowl game. It may not be the Cotton Bowl, but do you remember when any bowl game was an impossibility just a few years ago? The Cats are off to San Diego, and we can count on them kicking some PAC-10 butt.

4. The Chiefs are going to kill the Dallas Cowboys Thanksgiving Day — and it's going to be fun.

5. We not only get to pass laundry on to Mom, but isn't it kind of nice to see the family again? Enjoy the folks and let them know you love them. They've been climbing the walls just waiting to see you.

Have a good break. Get some rest and relaxation, and bring some leftovers back with you.

Life will be looking good next Monday.

► RUMORS OF ABUSE

Editor,
I am writing this letter to set the record straight. Last week, there were several rumors about Anton Hubert allegedly committing a battery on me. These stories were unfair, unfortunate and misleading. Anton has never physically abused me. On the night of Aug. 9, there was no abuse involved. We did have a bad argument. There was a lot of yelling. We were both upset. I threw several things, shattered lots of glass and broke a window.

Anton grabbed me to stop me from throwing anything else. As he pulled me one way and I pulled the other way, I fell to the couch. I got up to swing and hit him.

I then realized my arm was limp. I didn't dislocate my shoulder, but it was a shoulder separation, which could easily be put back in place.

The neighbors called the police when they heard the yelling. The police arrested Anton although I told them the same story.

They said they had to arrest him and I was not having him arrested, but the state of Kansas was.

Thank goodness the city prosecutor is a reasonable man. When I told him the story, he agreed that no charges would be filed.

Anton and I are working through the same problems many young couples encounter. No relationship is picture perfect. We are seeing a counselor to help us.

I have heard so many rumors about what people think happened, it has gotten me upset.

This is why I had to write this letter — to clear up all the misinformation that has come out of this incident.

Sometimes people try hard to come up with negative stories about athletes. When they mess up, I agree that athletes deserve punishment like anyone else. However, there is nothing to this incident, and I wish everybody would leave it alone.

► PHILANTHROPIC K-STATERS

Editor,

I am so proud of the K-State students and the many ways they contribute to local philanthropies. One such effort, Cats for Cans, is currently underway.

From Nov. 1 to Dec. 31, K-State students will be collecting non-perishable food items and money that will be used for the Thanksgiving and Christmas food baskets, as well as to stock the local food pantries.

Included in the student efforts are the Operation Turkey, in which the members of fraternities and sororities go door to door collecting food, and the Miss-a-Meal program, where the members of Greek societies miss one of their meals and contribute the funds to the food drive.

I would like to ask for your support of this wonderful effort by the K-State students to benefit those in our community who are in need of assistance. Please come to the game and bring a donation — either a non-perishable food item or a cash donation — to make the food drive successful!

Reason cannot reign where demons dwell

Less than 48 hours ago, I received some profoundly disturbing news.

It seems there are people on this campus who sincerely believe I am literally possessed by demons.

These misguided but well-intentioned individuals, I am told, believe when I sit here at the keyboard writing my column, demons are present guiding my hands.

But this is downright scary — people in this day and age, and at K-State of all places, believe demonic forces are controlling other people's thoughts, beliefs and actions. I am, in the minds of these superstitious folk, like a character in some sort of cosmic Dungeons and Dragons game, believing I have free will, but in actuality merely a pawn of unseen forces out to destroy the world. My strings are being pulled like a puppet.

How medieval. I can understand misinterpreting the Bible to condemn homosexuality. I can sympathize with believing so strongly that the Bible is literal truth to the point of insisting the Earth was created in six days and all scientific evidence to the contrary is false — planted to deceive the faithful. I can even deal with people who insist I am going to hell, because I don't believe in an afterlife any more than I believe in demons.

But demons controlling my column? Dark angels possessing people whose opinions disagree with fundamentalist Christians? This is almost too much for my 20th-century mind to comprehend.

I have to admit it scares the shit out of me.

It also saddens me beyond belief. We have entered an arena where logic cannot prevail, and operating by logic is one of the cornerstones of my world view. But there is no reasoning or logical thought when a superstition like demonic possession has taken hold. Logic and reason are useless against this kind of faith — when it comes to a conflict between logic and faith, faith more often than not wins. Reason is thrown into the trash.

It makes me very sad for the future of our species if we have not yet left the point where someone holding a conflicting political, religious or moral philosophy is grounds for accusing or believing them to be Satanic. Fear is taking hold, and demonization of those who are different has begun.

And since I am the object of these beliefs, it's personal.

I have to admit a degree of concern for my safety here. If people have started to believe I am consorting with the minions of Satan, then I have been removed from the ranks of ordinary humans by these believers. I have become a demon's pawn who must be stopped. And it is not much of a leap to see some fanatic believing it to be her or his godly duty to stop me by whatever means necessary.

How long will it be before those of us who are demon-possessed are rounded up into camps in order to protect the public? When do the ovens get stoked?

This is probably the hardest column I have ever written — for I am writing as a man whose faith in his species' ability to overcome superstition and fear and hatred has been rocked to the core. I'm beginning wonder if someone like me can ever peacefully coexist with those who profess to follow "the one true faith," the way Christians, Moslems and Jews do. Is peace possible when monotheism, coupled with superstition, dominates our species' beliefs?

It is going to take time, tears, meditation and reflective thought for me to come to grips with this. I only hope my faith in my fellow homo sapiens has not been damaged beyond hope.

Jesus, please save me from your followers.

Choosing the perfect diamond

Diamonds can be one of the scariest purchases for a young man. Pliny, the early Roman historian, said, "A diamond is the most valuable — not only of precious stones, but of all things in the world."

Many questions come to mind for a man with the thought of purchasing an engagement ring for his future bride. What size and color, where should I purchase a ring, what does she want, and most importantly, how much can I afford?

There are only four factors that establish the value of any diamond sold anywhere, according to the American Gem Society. They are the four C's of diamonds: cutting, color, clarity and carat weight. These provide a ruler by which the worth of a diamond can be accurately measured by a trained jeweler and aided by scientific instruments.

Cutting: The cutting should be regarded as the most important in determining the value of a diamond. Proper cutting and polishing contribute more to the beauty of a diamond than flawlessness. The ideally cut diamond is proportioned to return through the crown, or commonly known as the top of the stone, the maximum prismatic "fire" consistent with maximum brilliancy. Poorly cut stones permit light to leakage and have too little fire to give the ultimate in beauty.

Color: Crystal-clear absence of any color in the body of a stone is usually the finest quality. Nearly all diamonds have a yellowish body color. The degree of this color affects the price of diamond. Starting with colorless, the value of the diamond decreases as the more yellowish deepens.

Clarity: The clarity of a diamond refers to the degree to which a stone is free of interior or exterior blemish. If a diamond contains a flaw or inclusion which can be seen by the unaided eye, obviously its beauty is marred. Scientific instruments can aid in determining small internal cracks or cleavage which makes the diamond more fragile.

A flawless diamond contains no tiny cracks, pinpoints of carbon, foreign bits of other minerals, nor impurities of any kind which will reduce the cost of a diamond. Flawless stones are far from common, but they are not impossible to obtain. A quality jewelry store may have a good selection of flawless diamonds of various sizes and colors.

Carat weight: Weight is important, but it is cutting, color and clarity that determine the per-carat price of average-size gems. Carat weight is the least important in determining its value. It is important for the purchaser to know the weight of the diamond being considered to be purchased, but weight alone is no indication of the comparative values of different stones.

A fine one-carat diamond is more costly than an inferior stone of the same, or even greater weight. A carat is subdivided into 100 points, e.g., a quarter-carat diamond weighs 25 points. There are 141 three-quarter carats to an ounce.

All other factors being equal, a 50-point stone is worth more than two 25-point stones, a two-carat stone more than two one-carat stones of the same quality. Most important in the purchase of diamond is where you purchase it. You should purchase a diamond from a jeweler who is a member of the American Gem Society. This selective society was organized by the leading jewelers to vigilantly protect the buying public and for the maintenance of fine business standards and practices of its members.

A life-long friendship should be developed with a jeweler, a friendship that will aid and educate the consumer with purchases of jewelry for many years to come. You should never feel any pressure in the purchase of a diamond. If you do, then find another jeweler.

Diamonds are never on sale. They are probably the most controlled precious stones in the world. According to Charles E. Elliott, a local jeweler, the average man going to college spends between $1,500 and $2,000 on an engagement ring. The price of a diamond does not disclose the quality of a diamond. Elliott recommends that a couple window shop to determine the young lady's likes and dislikes. This can aid greatly with the purchase of a ring.

Remember, size does not matter, develop a friendship with a jeweler, diamonds are never on sale and getting what she wants can make the purchase of a lifetime easier.

Practicing "Purple Rain," Terry Shoe sits in the alley near Rusty's Last Chance. Terry spends most of his evenings in Aggieville peddling his candles and playing his harmonica.

Terry Shoe walks the streets of Aggieville with a great, big smile and a red, faded duffle bag, making his nightly rounds.

A carload of people hang out of a passing car and say, "Hey Terry, how's it going?"

Terry smiles and waves back.

He said he knows quite a few people, but not by their names.

Waiting for prime-time, Terry holds his harmonica and money cup in anticipation of a customer approaching him for a song or a candle.

Photos by
SHANE KEYSER

Story by
CORI CORNELISON

Walking on Moro, Terry makes his way toward one of his favorite places to set-up and wait for a candle sale or song request.

AGGIEVILLE IS Terry's turf

Terry's first stop of the night is the bench outside Dean's Liquor.

He sits down, opens his bag and pulls out differently shaped candles and arranges them beside him.

"Can't do much now because they can't function until after 12 or 1, when they break down their change," Terry said.

Jeff Barrett, local musician, stops to talk to Terry on his way to Rowdy Trouty's before performing for the night.

Terry takes his harmonica out of his pocket and begins to play a version of "Purple Rain" on an instrument that Prince may never have considered playing.

"I'm trying to memorize 'Purple Rain,' because I can hear you clear outside," he said to Barrett. Barrett grins as he listens to Terry vibrate out the tune.

The night has only begun for the candle man. Terry, the candle man, has been making candles since 1987.

Candles have become a way of life for Terry. "I wouldn't know what to do if I wasn't making candles or playing the harmonica," he said.

"I started making candles knowing it was a good hobby."

He said he gets wax from churches, yard sales and stores and creates the candles at his house.

Creativity and imagination are combined to create Terry's unique candles.

"I mostly stick with purple for K-State, but sometimes I make green and white ones for Notre Dame," Terry said.

Restaurant glasses make a good mold for candles, he said.

He said some of the candles in his bag are made from a sheet of broken wax.

The wax made its own pieces, and Terry said he drilled holes in them with the point of scissors to insert the wick.

He said he calls the candles K-State broken rocks because they are like real rocks that are weathered.

"Sometimes I do double ones," Terry said. "I can turn round ones into eight-sided or six-sided ones."

Friday and Saturday nights are good nights for selling candles.

He said he normally stays out until 2 or 2:30 a.m.

On a good night, Terry said he makes $45-$56 on harmonica requests and candle sales.

He said he shoots for enough money to buy canned vegetables and other things.

Terry said he spends about one hour at a time in one spot, then he gets up, gathers his things and heads down the street.

He rounds the corner into the alley next to Chuck's Car Wash and searches the ground for change, something he routinely does.

"It's real windy, so there won't be any $1 bills on the ground," Terry said.

He winds up a vacuum hose and proceeds to check the car wash machines for forgotten change.

"I found 51 cents," Terry said.

He said the most money he has ever found at the car wash was $2 in quarters, but he once found 23 pennies scattered around a vacuum.

Terry puts his findings into his pocket and turns right onto Moro Street.

He said he is known around town for his candles, but he also plays the harmonica.

Terry said he learned to play the harmonica at the age of 14 by listening to songs played on the radio.

He said he can play more than 50 songs.

"My favorite song to play is the 'Piano Man,'" Terry said. "'Dust in the Wind' is a good one, too."

Terry said he was born in Dayton, Ohio, and moved to Wamego when he was 9 years old. He said he moved to Manhattan in 1983.

He said his mother still lives in Wamego along with his brother's family.

Terry's eyes light up as he says he's happy living in Manhattan but wouldn't mind moving to Florida.

"I'd like to go to Sea World so I could see Shamu everyday," Terry said.

He rounds the corner next to Streetside Records and then turns left down the alley next to Hardee's.

Other than selling candles, Terry said he buys things at the Dollar General Store in the Manhattan Town Center and donates them to Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

"I go there about every other day," he said.

Making children happy by giving them toys makes him feel good, Terry said.

He sits down on a concrete slab next to Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon and displays his candles once again.

A group of people walk by. "How many candles you got tonight, Terry?"

Terry points to his candles.

"Oh, about 10."

The group looked quickly and proceeded to enter Last Chance.

Terry said exercise, music and money makes him happy.

Driving around Tuttle Creek with his family also makes him happy, he said.

He gathers his things and walks toward Moro Street for his next round.

Terry stops and bends over to pick up a paper cup lying on the sidewalk.

▶ BETANCOURT TO RUN TODAY IN NCAA NATIONALS

When senior Irma Betancourt arrived on campus three months ago for her final season of cross country, she had one goal in mind.

"She came in, and she was very set on qualifying for nationals," Coach Terry Drake said. "She had it all worked out in her head how fast she needed to be, and she has carried it out."

With an eighth-place finish at the District V meet in Stillwater, Okla., the Mexico City native accomplished her goal.

Betancourt is K-State's lone representative at the NCAA national race in Ames, Iowa, this morning and can therefore run her own race instead of worrying about how the team is doing.

"She has nothing to lose," Drake said. "She doesn't have the team depending on her — she has everything to gain and nothing to lose."

Being K-State's top runner all year long, Betancourt had the hopes of the team on her shoulders, but not today.

"I think you have more pressure on you when the team is there," she said. "I'll just think about my race."

Betancourt, who also excels on the K-State track team, has made steady progress every year. As a freshman she finished in the 80s at the district race followed by a 39th-place finish last year (she was injured her sophomore year).

"She's come a long way," Drake said. "I'll take that kind of progression with all of my runners."

Because she isn't an American, Betancourt will need to finish in the Top 15 today to garner all-American honors.

"It's going to be a hard race," she said. "I'll just go there, run my race and see what happens."

▶ HOOPSTERS EARN WIN OVER PELLA WINDOWS

Look past the name Pella Windows, and K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury said you can find a good team.

"They're a good, quality team, and they make you run your stuff," Asbury said after his team's 92-86 win Saturday night in the team's last exhibition game of the season.

Point guard Elliot Hatcher led the offense with 15 points on 5-of-6 shooting in less than 18 minutes of play and said Asbury uses these exhibition games to focus on the newcomers, not the veterans.

"He's pretty sure what we can do, but he wants to see what the newcomers can do," Hatcher said.

Asbury said one positive the team could take out of the victory over Pella Windows was 54-percent shooting on the game.

"For us, that's significant," Asbury said. "I don't know the number of times we shot that last year, but not often."

Asbury said he was also very impressed by the play of freshman forward Manny Dies, who had 14 points on 5-of-7 shooting.

"I thought Manny showed some life," Asbury said. "He's starting to play instinctively now."

The regular season starts Saturday with the season opener against Bradley.

"We're out of exhibition," Asbury said.

"We're down and ready to play now." Sophomore guard/forward Mark Young said the team is ready but also can improve in some other aspects.

"I think we're ready in some phases," Young said. "I think we're together, but you can win the national championship and still have things to work on."

▶ K-STATE WOMEN'S HOOPS DEFEATS PORTUGUESE TEAM

K-State's women's basketball team tasted its first victory of the season Friday night in a 62-58 exhibition victory over the Portuguese National Team.

The Wildcats opened up strong, taking a 9-0 lead on an off-balance shot by sophomore Brit Jacobson and took a 32-24 lead into halftime.

The K-State lead grew to 10 points in the second half before the Portuguese closed to within four in the game's waning minutes.

Though the Cats never trailed in the game, Coach Brian Agler said he was disappointed with the offense's performance.

"I was really disappointed with the way we kept our composure under pressure — which was just not very good," Agler said.

"And I was disappointed with our offense. When you run a motion offense, you make reads to counter what the defense does. We just didn't do a good job of it."

But the defense did perform, forcing 27 turnovers and blocking three shots.

"I do think we improved on defense," Agler said. "And one of our goals for the season was to shoot more free throws than the other team, and we achieved that."

K-State will begin the regular season at home Friday in the opening round of the Commerce Bank/Wildcat Classic. The Cats will open against Lamar, while Bradley will face Sacramento State.

The consolation game will be played at 11 a.m. Saturday followed by the men's season opener against Bradley. The championship will be played at 5 p.m.

Big day makes record season for Canty

Shana Nowell
staff writer

Last week, it was quarterback Matt Miller and wide receiver Mitch Running breaking records. This week, it was cornerback Chris Canty.

Canty now has the single-season record for interceptions with eight, breaking former K-State strong safety C.J. Masters' record of seven in a season set in 1992.

There were few things to be happy about in the locker room after the loss to Colorado, but Coach Bill Snyder said he was impressed with Canty's defensive performances on the gridiron Saturday.

"Chris played a tremendous ball game. I think that the interceptions were very special," Snyder said. "He did a nice job of breaking on the ball. He was able to gain some ground and make some very, very nice plays in some very critical situations."

The first of those critical situations came just four minutes into the first quarter. Colorado quarterback John Hessler's pass was intended for tailback Herschell Troutman but was intercepted at the K-State 31-yard line by Canty. That interception led to the first score of the game when kicker Martin Gramatica kicked a 30-yard field goal from the Colorado 12-yard line.

Early in the second quarter leading 7-3, the Buffaloes' offense threatened at the K-State 31-yard line when Hessler again passed for an interception. The pass was intended for wide receiver Rae Carruth. A second Colorado touchdown seemed inevitable as Hessler lofted the football in Carruth's direction. But Canty denied the Buffaloes that touchdown when he intercepted the pass at the Colorado 4-yard line, returning it for 16 yards.

The second interception might also have resulted in a Wildcat touchdown as the Cats drove the ball to the Colorado 6-yard line, but a fumble by Miller was recovered by Colorado.

Unlike the excitement surrounding Miller and Running after the Iowa State game, Canty said he found it hard to be excited about setting a new record.

"It feels great, but this loss kind of puts a damper on things," Canty said.

"It was an emotional letdown, and that last drive took it out of us. We came out and did what we had to do this game for 58 minutes, but we let down the last two minutes."

Canty said even though he broke Masters' record, he doesn't put a lot of stock into records.

"I just come out and play as hard as I can and put in 100 percent defensively,"

Offensive tackle Scott Heun said K-State has two of the best cornerbacks in the nation, and big plays are expected from them.

"I'm no defensive specialist, but Chris is a great player, lights out," Heun said.

Wide receiver Kevin Lockett said he felt that the offense put too much pressure on the defense to keep K-State in the game, but Canty said he disagrees.

"We have to come out as a team. If we don't come out and do that, we'll lose the game," Canty said. "I don't blame anybody for the loss. We came out with 95 guys, and we all lost the game. Snyder lost the game, our defense lost the game, and our offense lost the game. We lost as a team."

With Cotton Bowl hopes dashed, Canty said the team intends to play hard wherever the Cats are invited.

"Obviously all the guys wanted to be in the Cotton Bowl, but we didn't have the cotton fire today," he said. "We're just going to be happy going wherever we go, and we're going to play hard. We'll put 60 minutes together, offensively and defensively and get prepared for what lies ahead of us."

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

With 2:24 left in the K-State-Colorado showdown Saturday night, the Wildcat players and fans were as high as the hot-air balloon that floated over KSU Stadium earlier in the day.

But when the game ended with a 27-17 CU victory, K-State and 42,454 of its closest friends were like the skydivers who sailed onto the field before kickoff — they'd fallen back to the earth quickly and painfully.

"You talk about going from a high to a low," wide receiver Mitch Running said after the Cats were denied a 10-win season and a Cotton Bowl bid. "You're on cloud nine, and then you drop."

In a game that took nearly four hours to complete, only the last half-hour was important as the teams combined for 24 points in the last 5:53 to produce a thrilling ending.

After CU took the lead at the 5:53 mark on Neil Voskeritchian's 42-yard field goal, K-State promptly drove 72 yards, capped off by Eric Hickson's 1-yard plunge to give K-State a 17-13 lead with 2:24 left. CU took the lead for good when John Hessler hit James Kidd on a 20-yard pass with 64 seconds left, and with 45 ticks on the clock, Kerry Hicks recovered an errant shotgun snap for a touchdown.

"We didn't show up ... at least I didn't," said K-State quarterback

Matt Miller, who threw for 206 yards and ran for 62. "I expect myself to play better. I didn't pull through for us today. I'll take any of the blame that anyone wants to put on me, because I didn't play good."

The snap from center Jason Johnson was low and to the right of Miller, and he wasn't ready for it.

"I was checking out the defense, but I should've got it," Miller said. "It's my fault."

After chasing down the ball at the 5-yard line, Miller tried to throw it away but was hit by CU's Nick Ziegler. The ball rolled into the end zone, where it was pounced on by Hicks to seal K-State's fate.

"It hurts," Miller said. "It hurts bad, and it's going to hurt for a long time."

While K-State failed in its last-ditch comeback attempt, CU accomplished its with flying colors a drive earlier. After K-State had taken a 17-13 lead with 2:24 to go, CU had to drive 80 yards but weren't intimidated by the task at hand.

"When you play a lot of big games, you're used to this kind of environment," Colorado coach Rick Neuheisel said. "We've been to Michigan and Texas last year and Wisconsin this year, so when you get into this kind of environment, and certainly this was a great setting for college football — I love that first-down chant, I'm going to try to teach that to the Buff fans — it wasn't anything new for us."

Cornerback Chris Canty surprises Colorado's Rae Carruth by snaring his second interception of the game. With this catch, Canty broke the K-State record for interceptions in a season.

Colorado win dashes hopes of playing in New Year's Day bowl

CU made quick work of the "best" defense in the country on its last drive. Hessler hit three different receivers for gains of eight, 19 and 12, and after Herschell Troutman ran for 19 yards, Hessler hit a wide open Kidd for the score.

"I beat the corner (Joe Gordon) to the outside, and Hessler just laid in there for me," Kidd said. "He threw it perfectly."

The madness had started after CU took a 13-10 lead. The Cats needed only 3:29 and 10 plays to drive down the field. Miller completed passes of 11 and 18 yards and had runs of 18 and 14 to set up Hickson's score.

"They shut us down and then when we got into some things that could work," Running said.

It was a shocking turn of events because the Cats made it look easy. For the day, the offense sputtered, totaling only 287 yards offense and 81 yards rushing.

"If you look back at the game, we stopped ourselves everytime a drive stopped," offensive coordinator Dana Dimel said. "It's a total offensive effort, but we stopped ourselves and that's easy to say, but it's obvious today. There weren't too many drives where we just had three-and-out and it was because we didn't execute. It was because we dropped a ball or fumbled it."

The offense committed four turnovers, and the defense gave up 526 yards in total offense, playing on borrowed time Saturday night.

"This game was tremendously disappointing," Coach Bill Snyder said. "But quite honestly, we didn't play well enough to win."

Or as linebacker Perrell Gaskins said, "They were the better team today."

Dan predicts this year's postseason bowl games

It's about that time again. Time to start breaking out the old bowl contracts to see who's going where.

There are still a few games to be played — some of them pivotal — but semi-accurate predictions can be made.

As you read, keep these things in mind:

1. All Big 8 contracts were negotiated with the Big 12.

2. To qualify for a bowl, a team must have six wins against Division I-A opponents, so some conferences will have to forfeit their bids.

3. After conference championships (and in case of championship ties), bowls usually have their choice of qualified teams. For example, bowls might avoid rematches or choose a lower-ranked team that can guarantee a national audience.

So call your travel agents, folks. We're going on a trip around the nation with some of the best teams in college football ...

The Las Vegas Bowl will showcase Mid-American champion Toledo (10-0-1, 7-0-1 in conference) against Big West champion Nevada (9-2, 6-0) at 8 p.m. Dec. 14 on ESPN.

The Aloha Bowl will play host to Big 8/Southwest No. 6 Texas Tech (9-2, 5-2) and Pac-10 No. 4 Stanford (7-3-1, 5-3) in Honolulu at 2:30 p.m. Dec. 25 on ABC.

The Copper Bowl will see Big 8/SWC No. 5 Kansas play Western Athletic Conference No. 2 Brigham Young (8-3, 6-2) in Tuscon, Ariz., at 7 p.m. Dec. 27 on ESPN.

The Alamo Bowl will pit Big

8/SWC No. 4 Texas A&M (7-2, 4-1) against Big 10 No. 4 Michigan (8-3, 4-3) in San Antonio at 7 p.m. Dec. 28 on ESPN.

The Sun Bowl will see Pac-10 No. 3 Washington (7-3-1, 6-1-1) play Big 10 No. 5 Michigan State (6-3-1, 4-2-1) in El Paso, Texas, at 1:30 p.m. Dec. 29 on CBS.

The Independence Bowl will showcase at-large UCLA (7-4, 4-4) against at-large Iowa (6-4, 3-4) in Shreveport, La., at 4:30 p.m. Dec. 29 on ESPN.

The Holiday Bowl will play host to Big 8/SWC No. 3 K-State (9-2, 5-2) and WAC champion San Diego State (8-3, 5-2) in San Diego at 8 p.m. Dec. 29 on ESPN.

The Liberty Bowl will pit independent East Carolina (8-3) against at-large Baylor (7-3, 5-1) in Memphis, Tenn., at noon Dec. 30 on ESPN.

The Carquest Bowl will see Big East No. 3 Virginia Tech (9-2, 6-1) play Southeastern Conference No. 5 Louisiana State (6-4-1, 4-3-1) in Miami at 6:30 p.m. Dec. 30 on TBS.

The Peach Bowl will play host to Atlantic Coast Conference No. 3 Clemson (8-3, 6-2) and SEC No. 4 Arkansas (8-3, 6-2) in Atlanta at 7 p.m. Dec. 30 on ESPN.

The Sugar Bowl will use the Alliance fourth and sixth picks to take ACC champion Florida State (9-1, 7-1) and SWC champion Texas (8-1-1, 5-0) in New Orleans at 6:30 p.m. Dec. 31 on ABC.

The Outback Bowl will showcase SEC No. 3 Auburn (8-3, 5-3) against Big 10 No. 3 Penn State (7-3, 4-3) in Tampa, Fla., at 10 a.m. Jan. 1 on ESPN.

The Gator Bowl will pit ACC No. 2 Virginia (8-4, 7-1) against Big East No. 2 Syracuse (8-2, 5-1) in Gainesville, Fla., at noon Jan. 1 on NBC.

The Citrus Bowl will play host to SEC No. 2 Tennessee (9-1, 6-1) and Big 10 No. 2 Northwestern (10-1, 8-0) in Orlando at noon Jan. 1 on ABC.

The Cotton Bowl will see Big 8/SWC No. 2 Colorado (9-2, 5-2) play Pac-10 No. 2 Oregon (9-2, 6-2) in Dallas at 12:30 p.m. Jan. 1 on CBS.

The Rose Bowl will pit Big 10 champion Ohio State (11-0, 7-0) against Pac-10 champion Southern Cal (8-2-1, 6-1-1) in Pasadena, Calif., at 4 p.m. Jan. 1 on ABC.

The Orange Bowl will use the Alliance No. 3 and No. 5 picks to take Notre Dame (7-3, 5-1) for a showdown in Miami at 7 p.m. Jan. 1 on CBS.

The Fiesta Bowl will use the Alliance No. 1 and No. 2 picks to showcase a national-championship matchup between Big 8 champion Nebraska (10-0, 6-0) and SEC champion Florida (10-0, 8-0) in Tempe, Ariz., at 7 p.m. Jan. 2 on CBS.

► LEADERSHIP WEEK

Wefald: Hard work, dedication keys to developing leadership

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

There is no such thing as a born leader, K-State president Jon Wefald said in a speech for Leadership Week '95 Friday.

"It's nonsense to say that leaders are born," Wefald said. "If that were the case, I wouldn't be here today."

Wefald said his high school English teacher told him to forget about going to college because his grades were too poor to be successful in college.

"What did she know?" he said. "I'll tell you, America is a brilliant society because we allow ordinary men and women to go to bat 100 times."

The United States is one of the few places where people are not born into a leadership position or a concrete social class, he said.

"You can go from nowhere to somewhere," he said. "You're not able to do this in many other parts of the world, because they're born into a feudal society."

Wefald said geography, natural resources and IQ play only a tiny role in a person's leadership capabilities. But because people have free wills, they can overcome these disadvantages.

"IQs and SATs count for about that much," Wefald said, demonstrating an inch with his index finger and thumb. "In America, hard work, dedication, setting high goals and being confident in one's self can take you to the promised land."

Wefald said Herbert Hoover and Jimmy Carter had IQs that were off the charts, but they are not thought of as outstanding presidents.

Ironically, Abraham Lincoln, who was self-taught and had an average IQ, is considered to be one of the United States' greatest presidents, he said.

"Anybody with average intelligence can become a great leader," Wefald said. "You know why I say that? Because I know American history. Most of our best leaders were ordinary people who became extraordinary."

"It all boils down to this: Leadership can be learned. It's not something you inherit," he said.

er, the players would not speculate where they thought the team would be playing come bowl season.

"Wherever we go, we'll be happy to play," wide receiver Mitch Running said.

Coach Bill Snyder played down what a Cotton Bowl appearance could have done for his team.

"I don't think our program would have been any different except we would have 10 wins instead of nine," Snyder said.

Lockett said he was sad to see the chance at the Cotton Bowl slide by.

"Wherever we go, we're lucky to be able to go to a bowl game," Lockett said. "But we would have loved a chance to go to the Cotton Bowl."

Even though it's not the Cotton Bowl, the Cats could know their destiny as early as this afternoon.

Donaldson said his selection committee was meeting at 2 p.m. today and he expected the meeting to last no more than 45 minutes.

A decision will be announced shortly after.

Donaldson said he has no doubt that the Cats can bring a good following to the game in San Diego.

"We know if we have K-State in our game, we'll have a lot of people come out," Donaldson said.

But does a lower-ranked KU team stand a chance at the Holiday Bowl?

"We have 68,000," Donaldson said of the seating capacity at Jack Murphy Stadium, "and I would hate to have 68,000 people think I passed up a higher team."

"I always pick up litter when it's laying around," he said.

He enters Pizza Hut and proceeds to pay for a salad, which he piles high, and later grabs a handful of peppermints.

"Peppermints get me through the night," Terry said.

He steps out of Pizza Hut and stops to eat his salad and display his candles outside of Lair Gauche.

Many people have gotten to know more about me then candles and harmonica playing, Terry said.

"Most people know I've lost over 100 pounds," he said.

He said he is trying to lower his blood pressure to reduce the risk of a heart attack.

He said he has changed his eating habits with the help of a nutritionist and has encountered some new favorite foods.

"I like red beans and black-eyed peas the most," he said. "They have the most fiber."

The sky begins to darken, and it begins to rain.

Terry looks to the sky and smiles.

He remains there, under a canopy, waiting to sell a candle or play a request on his harmonica.

PUBLIC RADIO COULD LOSE FUNDS

As Congress tries to phase out government contributions to public radio, broadcasters all over the country look for other ways to make up lost funds. Republicans in Congress, including Sen. Bob Dole R-Kan., said they think that public broadcasters should find funding from the private sector instead of through the government.

Cat fans fight for flights

Agencies offer travel packages

Jeremy Crabtree
staff reporter

Head west, Wildcats. That is exactly what K-State football fans will be doing this holiday season, as the Cats will be playing Colorado State in the Plymouth Holiday Bowl Dec. 29 in San Diego.

Thinking about going? Then you had better act quickly. More than 1,800 K-State fans have already made plans to go San Diego through the KSU Alumni Association. Other travel agencies have also said rates are increasing as space decreases.

"More than 1,000 of those packages are for the charter air flights scheduled to depart from Kansas City, Topeka and Wichita," Amy Button Renz, president of the Alumni Association, said.

"The response has been outstanding and proves the fans are loyal to the Cats," she said.

The Alumni Association's package includes round-trip airfare to San Diego, hotel arrangements, a ticket to the game and tickets to the Alumni Association's pregame party. The cost for the air package is about $800 per person.

Due to the availability of charter planes, the Alumni Association will take air travel package reservations until Dec. 8. However, people can still purchase tickets to the Alumni Association's pregame party through Dec. 18.

Renz said she expects more people to make arrangements with the Alumni Association because the association was able to include bowl information in the December issue of the K-Stater.

"It was good timing as the magazine will get the word out to our 32,600 association members from coast to coast around Dec. 1," she said.

People can get information about the Alumni Association's travel packages through the bowl hotline at 1-800-898-2695. Manhattan residents are encouraged to use the Alumni Association's office line at 532-6260.

But the Alumni Association's package is not the only one available. Other travel agencies are offering their own bowl travel packages.

Direct Approach Travel is offering an air package for $696. The package includes round-trip airfare from Manhattan, a ticket to the game, three nights at a hotel next to the stadium where the game will be played and ground transportation from the airport and to the game.

"Right now we've got 29 seats sold," Bruce Slimmer, an agent with Direct Approach, said. "The plane holds 125. It's a 727, which can usually hold more people. But, it's the same plane that the Minnesota Timberwolves use, and they take some seats out to fit those seven-footers in."

"The response has been good for this early. I think it will start to pick up pretty quickly, though," he said.

Direct Approach Travel can be reached at 1-800-883-CATS.

HONOR SOCIETY

SPURS changes name to Silver Key

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

The Spurs sophomore honorary society has changed its name to Silver Key and ratified a new set of by-laws.

After disaffiliating from the national organization last March, the sophomore honorary society decided to take concrete action before Thanksgiving break.

"We did the breaking away last year, and when it was time for the new Spurs to come in, they've been the ones to set up a new constitution, by-laws and come up with a new name," said Mariah Tanner, junior in general human ecology.

Last year's Spurs members spoke to a University lawyer about the ramifications of disaffiliation and wrote a letter to the international organization, according to Tanner, last year's Spurs president.

"The fact is that Spurs' national group hasn't really been functioning," Silver Key Vice President

Amy Martin, sophomore in environmental engineering, said. "We were paying our dues to an organization that wasn't sending us any correspondence, like the newsletter that used to be a regular thing. So our group was like a satellite that wasn't getting any signals."

The international Spurs organization is run by recent members, so most are juniors and seniors at other colleges and universities.

"At international Spurs, the officers are students who are a year or two older than us, so the leadership was constantly changing, and we wanted a little more continuity," Silver Key President Amy Bartel, sophomore in architectural engineering, said.

These issues caused members to consider disaffiliating in order to put their resources to better use.

The group changed its name to Silver Key to

ANIMAL SCIENCE

Livestock team wins national title

Gina Buster
staff reporter

K-State's Livestock Judging Team won its second consecutive national title at the National Intercollegiate Livestock Contest Nov. 13 in Louisville, Ky.

"We were so happy for last year's team, but we didn't go in there thinking we need to do what last year's team did. We knew we needed to do what we could do," said Chris Mullinix, senior in animal science and industry.

The team placed first overall, first in reasons, sheep and hogs. They also placed second in cattle.

Livestock judging includes ranking 12 classes of animals by categories of breeding, genetic traits and form and function of animals. There are four animals in each of the 12 classes, and students have 15 minutes to place each class, said Scott Schaake, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry and livestock judging team coach.

The students use visual appraisal of the animals to rank them according to the ideal animal, Schaake said.

Mullinix said Schaake's experience and expertise helped the team to never go into tournaments blind.

"He has an incredible eye for livestock," Mullinix said. "There was nothing we didn't see at practice that could have come at us during a tournament."

At tournaments, students spend the morning ranking livestock and afternoons presenting oral reasons to the judges.

"For the oral presentations the students have to become really good speakers," Schaake said. "Most of the members are tremendous speakers. They've spent over 100 hours practicing it."

Beginning last January, the team practiced Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons and all day Saturday.

To prepare for competition the team would either stay at K-State and judge the University's livestock, or it would travel to different producer's farms around the state and judge their livestock, Schaake said.

Jenny Barker, senior in animal science and industry, said she really enjoyed going to the producer's farms.

"Not only did it help to practice, but we got to see how

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

Dean Don Rathbone has been dean of the College of Engineering for 22 years, longer than any tenured dean of engineering in the nation. Rathbone came to K-State in 1973 after working at the University of Pittsburgh and the University of Idaho.

Dean doubles as teacher

Heidi Evert
staff reporter

Dean Don Rathbone has been the dean of the College of Engineering for 22 years, longer than any tenured dean of engineering in the nation.

Rathbone started his career at the University of Pittsburgh as an assistant professor. After Pittsburgh, Pa., he transferred to the University of Idaho where he was a professor and department chairman.

In 1973, Rathbone packed his bags and moved to Manhattan to become the dean of the College of Engineering and a professor at K-State.

Rathbone said he came to K-State because he had an opportunity to work with students, enhance and expand the graduate-level programs and work on personal goals.

Rathbone said he liked the fact K-State concentrates on undergraduate education.

"It's my kind of school," Rathbone said.

Teaching is something most deans don't do. Rathbone, however, has taught the honors seminar for more than 20 years. He said he enjoyed teaching because it keeps him in touch with students.

"The interaction I've had with the students has been a big plus," Rathbone said.

Michelle Munson, fifth-year senior in electrical engineering and physics, said Rathbone is an excellent teacher and person.

"I think he's a fabulous person. He's one of the reasons I stayed in engineering," Munson said.

Rathbone is responsible for program development, the engineering extension service, fundraising and facilities.

"I enjoy all aspects of the job," Rathbone said, "especially watching the college grow and mature in certain areas."

KASSEBAUM ANNOUNCES RETIREMENT PLANS

(AP) Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., announced Nov. 20 she would not seek reelection to a fourth term in the Senate. She said the decision to not seek reelection was personal.

"My reason for this decision is very simple and purely personal," Kassebaum said. "I believe the time has come for me to leave the Senate and pursue other challenges, including the challenge of being a grandmother."

She said she was appreciative of all the support she has received over the years and she has been honored to be a part of Kansas politics.

"For the past 17 years, I have had the privilege of representing Kansas in the United States Senate," she said. "I have been honored by this chance to serve, and I deeply appreciate the strong support and counsel I have received from so many Kansans throughout the years."

She said she does have regrets regarding her decision because she has enjoyed her work in Congress.

"I have not made this decision without reservations and regrets. I believe that service in the Congress is a honorable profession," she said. "I have been proud to serve with so many colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, who are genuinely and deeply committed to the well-being of our nation."

Kassebaum said politics was the lifeblood of democracy and not a spectator sport.

Although it is not always respected as a profession in America, it is nothing more or less than the working out of our competing interests and priorities as a nation, she said.

She said she hopes she has influenced young people in America to become actively involved in politics because participation in politics is responsible for making our nation great.

"We have become a great nation because so many Americans before us chose to be involved in shaping our public life, focusing our national priorities and forging consensus to move forward," she said. "I hope I have contributed to that tradition and that in some small way I have helped encourage others, particularly young Americans, to become involved."

Ron Wilson, director of the Huck Boyd Institute at K-State and former Kassebaum employee, said she has given a great deal to the state of Kansas, and she deserves the chance to make a decision for herself.

"It is a loss of seniority for the state since she is chairman of a powerful committee," Wilson said, "but she has offered the finest caliber of representation for our state."

IRELAND APPROVES LEGALIZATION OF DIVORCE

DUBLIN, Ireland (AP) — Defeated divorce opponents are considering a court challenge to Ireland's vote to legalize divorce, saying the government misused taxpayers' money to campaign for the referendum.

Voters approved a constitutional amendment legalizing divorce by little more than 9,000 ballots out of more than 1.6 million cast Friday.

Anti-divorce campaigners blamed their loss on government-funded, pro-divorce advertisements that the Supreme Court ruled illegal Nov. 17.

They have seven days to consult lawyers about a challenge before the amendment, which legalizes divorces for couples after at least four years of separation, is signed by President Mary Robinson. Political analysts, however, give a challenge little hope of succeeding.

The advertisements were ordered by the government of Prime Minister John Bruton, who led the pro-divorce campaign and paid for with $800,000 in taxpayers' money.

Pointing out that the amendment says children and spouses must be properly provided for, the ads said, "The government is asking you to vote 'yes.'"

Most of the advertisements had appeared in Irish newspapers and on radio before the Irish Supreme Court ruled that they constituted unauthorized interference with the democratic process.

WORLD WIDE WEB PROVIDES NEW METHODS OF TEACHING IN CLASSROOM

Faculty and staff were shown how the World Wide Web could be used in the classroom during a speech for the Provost's Lecture Series on New Directions in Teaching and Learning Nov. 20.

Harvard Townsend, computing and network systems manager for the Department of Computing and Information Sciences, illustrated his speech by using a homepage he created.

The page, which can be accessed at (http://www.cis.ksu.edu/~harv/provost/title.html), contains a listing of the main points of the speech and has links to sites that demonstrate some of the capabilities of the World Wide Web.

Townsend said the World Wide Web can be used in the classroom in two different ways.

First, students can access course materials such as lecture notes and assignments, exam reviews, exam results and links to other related sites.

"If students forget an assignment, you can point them to the Web," Townsend said.

Secondly, the World Wide Web can be used as a virtual classroom where an entire course may be taken over the Internet, Townsend said.

On-line lectures, testing, reviews, materials, interactive multimedia textbooks and group and one-on-one communication could all be part of a virtual classroom.

SECTION OF ALLEN ROAD CLOSES

Allen Road is closed to traffic from Hayes Drive to west Sloan Street due to reinforcement storm sewer box construction and road repairs.

Sections of the road have been closed, but contractors have moved the traffic control farther west on Allen Road.

The project includes complete removal and replacement of Allen Road and replacement of the storm sewer box.

Karen Davis, assistant director for Planning in Community Development, said the road needs to be replaced because of unsuitable soil characteristics in the area.

The entire project will cost the city $980,000. Manhattan received a Community Development Block Grant of $305,000 from the state.

Manhattan was required to match the grant with $305,000. Additionally, the city commission set aside $370,000 for the storm sewer.

The grant is awarded on a competitive basis to towns of 50,000 residents or less. It is funded by the Federal Department of Housing and Development.

Jack Messer, assistant director for engineering, said traffic normally moves from Allen Road to Tuttle Creek

JUSTIN STAHLMAN/Collegian

Boulevard. Commuters can use Griffith Drive or Casement Road to get to Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

He said Casement Road is the best choice because there is a signal for traffic entering

Tuttle Creek Boulevard. The construction is moving as scheduled and is to be completed in March 1996.

NEW HOLOGRAM DISPLAYS HELP BRAIN SURGEONS IN OPERATING ROOMS

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) — The surgeon leans into the drill as it grinds into the patient's skull.

Then he pauses, turning to study a shimmering, translucent image of a head projected nearby.

He moves his fingers through the ghostly image sculpted in light, gauging the distance between a tumor and a blood vessel, estimating how deeply he should scoop his instruments into the patient's brain.

Then he returns to his drill and continues his work.

This is medical technology in 1995.

About 100 surgeons around the country have been using such hologram displays in clinical trials for the past four years, and the University of New Mexico was one of the first places to use them in the operating room.

"It's very cool technology. It actually gives the surgeons a preview of what they're getting into," said Dr. Frederick Rupp, a radiologist at the university.

Police reports

Reports are taken directly from the daily logs of the campus and Riley County police departments. Because of space constraints, we do not list wheellocks, calls for escorts or minor traffic violations.

KSU POLICE DEPARTMENT

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26

At 2:40 a.m., James R. Henton, 511 Laramie St., main floor apartment, was arrested for DUI and transported to Riley County jail.

RILEY COUNTY POLICE

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21

At 8:53 p.m., Daniel G. West, 520 15th St., Ogden, and Eric E. Brown, 520 15th St., Ogden, were battered and robbed at gun point by five men. Two of the men were armed with pump shotguns. The victims were held at gun point in a room while the suspects removed two computers, a 27-inch RCA television and a RCA VCR. Both victims relieved minor injuries, none of which required medical attention. Total loss was estimated at $4,730.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 24

At 6:36 p.m., Jake Mosier, 120 S. Delaware Ave., was involved in a major damage, non-injury accident with a deer. Damage was more than $500.

At 11:44 p.m., Christopher A. Moyer, 1005 Vattier St., was arrested on a Riley County warrant. Bond was set at $50.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 24

At 12:29 a.m., Maurice L. Jackson, 922 Riley Lane, was arrested for fleeing and eluding an officer, driving on a suspended driver's license and a Pottawatomie County warrant, and criminal use of a financial card. Bond was set at $5,300.

CORRECTIONS

► Due to a reporter's error in the Nov. 20 review of "The Music Man," two actors were misidentified. Jessica Kincaid played Marion Paroo, the lead, not Jill Huguet, who played Mrs. Paroo. In addition, the reporter incorrectly identified character Harold Hill as Herbert Hill.

► In the Nov. 13 review of opera performer Carolyn James, the reporter misidentified Mozart's "Alleluja" as "Non mi dir," a Mozart piece that was omitted. The Collegian regrets the errors.

Bulletins

ANNOUNCEMENTS

► Grade reports for the fall 1995 semester will be mailed to students' permanent addresses on Dec. 20. Any changes to permanent addresses need to be made by 5 p.m. Dec. 15. Fall 1995 grades will be available on transcript Dec. 21.

► Fall 1995 undergraduate diplomas will be mailed to non-delinquent graduates Jan. 16-19, 1996. Deadline for clearing delinquencies is Jan. 10 for diploma mail out.

► All undergraduate students in health-related degree programs are eligible to apply for a student cancer research award of $500. Applications are available in the Center for Basic Cancer Research in Ackert 125 and 413. Applications are due Dec. 1.

Professor researches in Antarctica

Chris Oakley
staff writer

Charles Chaffin, an adjunct faculty member in the chemistry department, will be spending the holidays at Mt. Erebus in Antarctica.

Chaffin left Nov. 18 for McMurdo Station, where he will undergo one week of survival training.

"Because everywhere you go on the continent is by aircraft, there is always the possibility in the cold weather that anywhere you go, the aircraft may have problems that would be non-catastrophic," Chaffin said. "You may have to set the thing down and wait until someone can get to you. Because of that possibility, everyone who goes down there has to go through survival training."

After survival training, Chaffin will use infrared spectroscopy technology methods that he helped create to measure volcanic gasses.

"I am looking forward to this," Chaffin said. "The work is interesting. It will be a nice trip and very exciting for me — the chance of a lifetime, but I would prefer to have the chance of a lifetime in say, Hawaii."

Chaffin, who obtained his doctorate in chemistry in 1994 from K-State, will spend about five weeks in Antarctica using technology and methods to measure the ratio of sulfur dioxide and hydrochloric acid in the volcano at Mt. Erebus, 13,000 feet above sea level.

The ratio could lead to insights about emissions, which could be a prelude to eruptions, he said.

Chaffin will be spending most of his time at a hut, located 11,000 feet above sea level, but he will have to sleep in tents outside because the building will be used for research around the clock.

"The reason for that is that it is light all day now. They don't have night, and people are coming from different parts of the world to join this project. People will have different sleeping schedules," Chaffin said.

While studying analytical chemistry at K-State, Chaffin worked on developing infrared technologies specifically for air monitoring.

"We developed open path STIR monitoring technology. You shine a beam of infrared light through air, and then you can pick up molecules in air and use it to detect pollution or in a chemical plant where it may be their profit going downwind," Chaffin said.

After graduation, Chaffin and Tim Marshall, a research associate in chemistry, began to commercially market this technology and created Aerosurvey Inc.

"We provide technology to industries who may want to reduce pollution or in a chemical plant where it may be their profit going downwind," Chaffin said.

Chaffin and Marshall use equipment privately owned by Bill Fateley, chemistry professor. Fateley developed the methods of using infrared spectroscopy instrumentation in the open atmosphere. He also serves as a technical adviser to Aerosurvey.

Individuals in other fields soon became interested in the technology that Aerosurvey could provide.

Peter Francis from England contacted them wanting to study the activity of volcanoes. Traditionally, volcanologists had to use the "grab sampling" method where air samples are bottled up and then analyzed at a lab.

Chaffin and Marshall's technology enables scientists to set up equipment away from the crater and monitor the activity that way.

Chaffin monitored a volcano in Sicily last summer and was then contacted by Philip Kyle, a geologist at New Mexico Institute of Mining and Technology, the leader of the expedition to Mt. Erebus.

"Volcanologists have pet volcanoes that they like to study," Chaffin said. "Dr. Kyle's is Mt. Erebus in Antarctica. He wants to haul me and my equipment down there to see what I can tell him about the fumes coming out of the volcano. I will set up on the rim and let the plumes carry from the crater and float through the beams, and I will be able to tell him how much sulfur dioxide and hydrochloric acid there is."

Discovery Fair informs, entertains 3rd-graders

Claudette Riley
staff writer

The Discovery Fair brought a circus-type atmosphere to learning for third-graders at Ogden Elementary School.

Students used simple machines, body experiences, optical illusions and language tricks to demonstrate Howard Gardner's seven intelligences, which include quantitative, interpersonal, intrapersonal, kinesthetic, linguistic and spatial reasoning.

Students in Dave Redmon's third-grade class each performed three tricks to more than 250 students. They also sent invitations to school board members and parents.

David Thomas, student teacher and senior in elementary education, said students used basic magic tricks, pneumatic devices and electromagnets to demonstrate their knowledge.

"They use something called a hook to get people interested. We teach them sort of how to be a used car salesman. They make learning lively, like a circus-type atmosphere," Thomas said.

"One of the most profound things is that by teaching the other students about these basic fundamentals, they learn them inside and out."

Students gained ownership by choosing what they wanted to learn and teach, Thomas said.

"The main success would probably be their interaction with the other kids, though they do learn a vast amount of large concepts," Thomas said.

Kristina Gill, age 9, demonstrated the difference between potential and kinetic energy using a marble maze.

"I showed them about potential and kinetic energy and then asked them why sometimes our eyes play tricks on us," Gill said.

"It was fun because I found out that I could read better than some fifth-graders."

At the beginning of each Discovery Fair, the Honeybees group performed a short play and recited favorite songs and poems.

Abby Baugous, age 9, said in the play, some people were good and others bad.

"We learned to be friends with everyone and not to make fun of other people," Baugous said. "It is hard to talk to other kids you don't know and like to the fourth- and fifth-graders, but the younger kids were easier."

Trevor Hendrick, age 8, said performing was easier after finishing the first few shows. A trick of his showed how real submarines compress air since he could displace it but not make it disappear.

"We got to show them new stuff that they had never known," Hendrick said.

Dave Redmon, third-grade teacher, said his Honeybee students wrote papers about what they learned and how that made them sweeter and smarter.

"We explore for six weeks and then perform various kinds of demonstrations and tricks," Redmon said. "It takes the road of language development and helped them boast their understanding of the world around them. They recognize that learning and language are fun and an adaptable medium."

Mother charged with arson, murder of her 2 children

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Appearing relaxed and almost cheerful, a woman accused of setting a house fire that killed two of her children waived extradition and will return to Kansas to face arson and murder charges.

Debora Green is charged with aggravated arson and two counts of first-degree murder in the deaths of Tim Farrar, 13, and Kelly Farrar, 6. Green is also charged with two counts of attempted first-degree murder.

Green, 44, and another daughter, Kate Farrar, 10, escaped the Oct. 24 fire at their suburban Prairie Village home.

Green was transferred to the Johnson County Jail in suburban Olathe, and a first court appearance was scheduled for Monday. Her attorneys said they may ask to have her $3 million bond reduced.

Clad in light blue jail-issue pants and blouse and handcuffed to another prisoner, Green spoke softly but clearly in waiving extradition Friday before Jackson County Circuit Judge Peggy Stevens McGraw.

Before the hearing began, Green sat in a holding area with several other prisoners, speaking quietly and laughing occasionally in talks with her three attorneys.

But after the hearing, attorney Ellen Ryan said Green was in profound grief over the fire and the loss of her children. Green is consumed with worry for her surviving daughter, Ryan said.

"That's all she talks about is worry about Kate, and what the pressure is doing to Kate," Ryan said. "I think she is still somewhat dazed and confused. She's very surprised that she would be charged with these kinds of crimes. She lost everything in this fire, including her children, everything, and she's astounded."

Green's lead attorney, Dennis Moore, said Green maintains her innocence. And he said the bond amount is unfairly high.

"The Metro Squad said two weeks ago they knew who was responsible for this, and yet she didn't leave or intend to leave," he said. "She intends to stay and fight the charges."

Green was arrested Wednesday outside a Kansas City theater where she had taken Kate to ballet practice. Investigators quickly ruled arson in the fire that destroyed the family's six-bedroom, $400,000 home. Accelerants were poured in several areas of the house and fed the flames.

Green escaped the fire through her back bedroom door on the first floor. Kate survived by climbing through her second-floor bedroom window onto the garage roof and jumping.

The investigation also included a closer look at a fire about 16 months earlier that damaged the family's previous home and the mysterious illness of the children's father, Dr. Michael Farrar, weeks before the October fire.

Farrar was hospitalized again after the fire.

His condition was upgraded from serious to fair Friday.

Holiday Bowl paycheck hinges on ticket sales

It's important you purchase your tickets from K-State and not call the Holiday Bowl directly.

It's official, K-State fans. The Plymouth Holiday Bowl extended an invitation to the Wildcats by phone Nov. 20, flying out to make it official Tuesday.

Colorado State's win over San Diego State Saturday filled the bowl's other spot.

That means it's time to start planning for that 28-hour drive to San Diego.

Tickets run $36 and can be purchased from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics ticket office at 532-7606 in Manhattan, or call 1-800-221-CATS.

It's important you purchase your tickets from K-State and not call the Holiday Bowl directly.

Although the Cats are guaranteed between $1.3 and $1.5 million for the game, that is dependent on the school selling its allotment of just more than 10,000 tickets.

Buying directly from the Bowl means the Athletic Department might be forced to eat the loss on ticket sales, stealing dollars that could benefit all K-State sports.

Additionally, a strong showing by K-State faithful at the game is essential in guaranteeing the Cats get these opportunities in the future.

The Holiday Bowl took a gamble by choosing the Cats instead of the University of Kansas, which has more alumni in the San Diego area.

It took that gamble because of the enthusiasm of the crowd officials saw at the Colorado game, and because some of our more hospitable tailgaters gave the chair of the selection committee beef and brew — a fact he mentioned favorably in the teleconference Monday.

So make the call, Cat fans.

Let's paint San Diego purple Dec. 29, and make this Holiday Bowl the most memorable ever — while cheering our Cats to their first 10-win season since 1910.

It's OK to say 'queer'

Why do I use the word queer? Isn't that word derogatory and demeaning?

The short answer is no, it's not, not anymore — and it's short.

What started as an in-your-face tactic of the radical group Queer Nation in the late 1980s has gone mainstream — the use of the word queer as a synonym for homosexual, lesbian, bisexual, gay and transgendered.

What was once a term of opprobrium is now a commonplace and convenient word to use when referring to what started as gay.

The lack of a single, all-inclusive word to describe our movement has been an issue for activists for years. "Gay" has been used extensively for a long time, but the word has a connotation of white, middle-class male homosexuals.

Many lesbians reject the use of the word gay to describe themselves because of its male-centered history.

So in the 1980s, many started adding the words "and lesbian" to anything that said "gay" for the sake of inclusion.

A good example of this ideological shift can be seen in the name change the National Gay Task Force went through in the early 1980s — it became the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force. Closer to home, Gay Services of Kansas at the University of Kansas became Gay and Lesbian Services of Kansas (GLSOK).

Next, the bisexuals spoke up, demanding a place, too. As the power of the bisexual movement grew, the names of organizations began to change to reflect this new reality. "Gay, lesbian and bisexual" became commonplace.

This ideological shift can be seen in the name change K-State's student organization went through in the early 1990s — from Gay and Lesbian Resource Center to BGLS — Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Students. KU's student group went through a similar change, from GLSOK to Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Services of Kansas (LesBiGays OK).

Always striving to be more inclusive, the list grows to include more and more names. The next to demand inclusion were the transgendered — those who cross dress, live as the opposite sex, or have undergone sex-reassignment surgery — Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgendered.

That's quite a mouthful and unworkably clunky. Some shorthand was needed to compress all of this into one word. An attempt was made with "LesBiGayTrans," but this artificial word never fully caught on. It also leaves no room for growth — that is, unless you want to tack more on to the end: "LesBiGayTransWhatever" — sheesh! Forget it.

Enter the word "queer." It's simple and one syllable long. It already carries a connotation of sexual and gender nonconformity. Many now use the word queer as shorthand — it means gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered and whatever else we might want to add.

Queer started as a rebellious moniker by urban activists in the late 1980s — mainly the now-defunct Queer Nation. QN's legacy lives on in the word it reclaimed for our movement.

Queer, once an insult, has been neutralized. By taking the power to insult away from the word, power was taken from the oppressors who used it.

Its definition is that of "unusual, odd, or out-of-the-ordinary." We are certainly that. Homosexuality, bisexuality and transgenderism are certainly not the norm. Although they are not abnormal — just as left-handedness is not the norm, it is still a normal part of the human experience.

Some argue queer is an equivalent to the word "nigger," an assertion to which I vehemently disagree. Nigger (please understand I am using that word for illustrative purposes — I mean no disrespect) is only acceptable within the in-group. African Americans can call each other nigger if they want, but heaven help an outsider who does.

But queers encourage non-queers to use the term, for its simplicity and inclusiveness. As long as it is not used in a hostile manner, I encourage straight people to use it. In fact, advice I give to straight people is, when in doubt, use the term queer. If the person doesn't like the term, they'll tell you.

Nigger is also not a term from which one has traditionally been expected to hide. If you were called a nigger, so be it. It is a hateful term, but it is also a descriptor of outward appearance.

Not so with queer. You can't necessarily tell a queer by appearance — and queers are encouraged to hide. To blend in, to hide. Deny it — "No I am NOT a queer." Can you imagine African Americans denying their heritage in such a way?

Many of those who object to the word queer are older — those who grew up in a time when you had no choice but to hide, when being a homosexual or a bisexual was a truly shameful thing.

But a younger generation is coming of age now — younger than 30 years old, who don't remember the time before AIDS, and who have never known a time when homosexuality was shameful. It is from this generation the word queer is bursting forth, as just another label.

And a convenient one at that.

Potential success depends on choice of mate

Every fall for as long as I can remember, I pick up a copy of Forbes' "The 400 Richest People in America."

The whole edition of Forbes is dedicated to America's most financially successful. It has been a longtime goal of mine to appear in the list.

The issue is 400 short biographies with photos of the richest individuals in America.

Forbes gives a brief overview of the person's professional career and personal information such as age, number of children, place of birth and marital status.

For the first time, I have come to the conclusion that the individuals on the very top of the list all were single or have never been divorced. No special university or business school was one factor that contributed to these individuals' success.

One of my agricultural economics professors has talked about the success of billionaire William Henry Gates III and the company he co-founded with billionaire Paul G. Allen of Microsoft Corporation.

One of the keys to these two men's success with Microsoft was that each was single and seemed to have stable personal lives. Gates was married on New Year's Day, 1994.

SCOTT SMITH

Allen is still single. It will be interesting to track these two's continued careers and hopeful success.

It comes down to the fact that these individuals have stable personal lives. It would be interesting to conduct a study of personal relationships of highly successful individuals — not just their financial, but political and social areas.

There is a correlation between stable personal relationships and personal success.

A good personal relationship can be a great benefit to a person's financial success.

On the other hand, problems with a personal relationship can distract and even destroy the success.

By working for my father, who is an attorney, I have seen how divorce only hurts and destroys bonds that have taken years to build.

I have one male friend who believes in the statement made by Tommy Lee Jones in the movie "The Client." "I don't bargain," he said in reference to finding a mate.

I tend to agree with my dear friend. One should never settle for second best for something so special and meaningful in one's life.

On Wednesday evening before Thanksgiving, my brother, a friend and I decided to hit the bar scene in Hutchinson.

It was refreshing to see old high school chums and the girls from high school and community college days.

It is interesting to think about where my life could have been if I would of chosen one of the girls from my past.

Would I have been making a bargain?

Scott Smith is a senior in agricultural economics.

► THANKS FROM HARKERS

Editor,

Brad Harker and his family would like to thank the Manhattan community and K-State for all their support during the past few months.

We appreciate the many forms of concerns and contributions we have received. Brad's progress continues to be strong and steady, and hopefully he will be back on the K-State campus for spring semester.

We would like to especially thank K-State's baseball coach, Mike Clark, his staff, the K-State baseball team and the administration of K-State for all their help.

Coach Clark personally visited Brad frequently in Ohio during the critical times.

Assistant coaches, both past and present, also visited Brad. K-State is fortunate to have such personally dedicated personnel.

Manhattan's and K-State's caring has definitely been a positive influence on Brad's recovery.

Wildcats, Wildcats, and more Wildcats

It was a big week for Wildcats. Let's start in the Big 10, where the Wildcats of Northwestern are 10-1 and headed for the Rose Bowl for the first time since 1949.

It hasn't been long since K-State and Northwestern were ridiculed together. Both Wildcats. Both purple and white. Both playing football in smash-mouth rushing conferences they had no right to play in.

But things have changed at both schools.

I have to admit that when the Wildcats upset Notre Dame in the season-opener for both teams, I truly hoped it would be their last win. What could be better than the Fighting Irish losing to a 1-10 laughing stock?

I even thought it might happen the next week when Northwestern fell to Miami or Ohio.

But it seems the loss was a fluke and the Wildcats are for real. In fact, a look at the last play of the Miami game shows Northwestern was a long-snapper short of causing another national championship-controversy.

Now for some basketball — and how about those Arizona Wildcats?

Snubbed by the pollsters in the preseason, Arizona fell out of the rankings for the first time in the 1990s. (It seems Wildcats everywhere have a hard time getting respect.) But they never lost their poise, upsetting Georgetown 91-81 in the final of the preseason NIT.

Arizona is once again ranked.

Now for some hometown Wildcats, and a look at Big 8 basketball in its final season.

K-State earned the nickname "Cardiac Cats" in 1992-93, when the Anthony Beane-led squad couldn't seem to win a game without a last-second shot.

Though senior point guard and top-returning scorer Elliott Hatcher was sidelined with a shoulder injury, the Cats pulled off another miraculous finish Saturday against a solid Bradley University team picked to win the Missouri Valley Conference this year.

Further west in the conference, Colorado put what was supposed to be its most talented team in years up against the mighty Gauchos of University of California-Santa Barbara.

They lost.

And they lost hard, 71-47.

And they lost despite having the school's most-heralded recruit Chauncey Billups and 1994's Atlantic Coast Freshman of the Year Martice Moore.

What was it Colorado football player said after the K-State game?

"Same old K-State, same old Colorado."

Right back at ya, Buffaloes. The only thing Boulder will have to cheer about this winter — at least they don't have Oklahoma's "mystique."

And on the women's side, the Wildcats racked up an impressive win over a good Lamar University team.

Not only is Lamar a solid team (last year it finished third in the Sun Belt conference, splitting games with nationally ranked Western Kentucky and Arkansas State), the Cats controlled the first 25 minutes of the game and stayed cool when things went wrong.

"I think we kept our composure, and that's the important thing," junior wing Missy Decker said.

Offensively, things are looking good for the Cats. In two regular-season games, two different players have led the team in scoring. And Coach Brian Agler said he expects it to stay that way.

"We may go seven games this year and have someone different be our leading scorer. And we have our two leading returners (sophomore wing Brit Jacobson and Decker) who haven't done that yet."

K-State's women's basketball team got the season started on the right foot, going 2-0 to win the Commerce Bank/Wildcat Classic Friday and Saturday.

The tournament opened Friday with the Lady Cardinals of Lamar University taking on the Hornets of Cal State-Sacramento. The Cardinals ran Sac State into the ground, turning an 11-point halftime lead into a 98-69 drubbing.

The second game featured host K-State and the Lady Braves of Bradley University. Although the Wildcats kept the lead after the 14:09 mark, neither team was able to take control of the first half, with the Cats' largest lead hitting six points twice in the period.

But the Cats opened it up in the second, going on a 16-6 run — six of the points coming from senior guard Carlene Mitchell — from which Bradley would not recover.

The Cats extended their lead to 17 in the game's waning minutes, with the final 61-50 K-State.

Mitchell, an All-Tournament selection, led all scorers with a career-high 18 points on seven-of-10 shooting, including hitting her only three-pointer.

Junior post Andria Jones finished with eight points, and sophomore point guard Amanda Chamberlain added seven, including her first career trey.

With the Cats set to face Lamar in the championship, the teams' divergent styles were not lost on Wildcat coach Brian Agler.

"Controlling the tempo is going to be pretty important," Agler said. "It's not that we're a slow team, but we rely on execution, and they want a lot of possessions."

The Cats were able to control the first half against Lamar, taking a 42-27 lead into the break behind 18 points from Jones, who had already eclipsed her career high.

"I think in the starting minutes, we stunk it up," Lamar coach David McKey said. "But I have to give K-State credit. They took us out of our game. Their defense forced us to take poor shots."

Lamar came back in the second half behind the scorching outside shooting of Lara Webb and Denise Scalley, coming back from 17-points down to tie the game in the last two minutes.

But a 3-point goal by junior wing Missy Decker put the Cats up in the final minute. A Lamar turnover resulted in a break-away lay-up for Chamberlain on the in-bounds play, giving the Cats an 81-76 win.

Decker said K-State was just running its offense when she came open.

"We just kept trying to run good offense," Decker said, denying any set play was designed for her. "She wasn't going to guard me, so I let it go."

Jones led all scorers with 29 points on eight-of-12 shooting from the field and a perfect 13-of-13 from the line, while also leading both teams in rebounds with eight.

"Andria's really coming on. She's starting to come into our system and understand how she can score in a lot of different ways," Agler said. "And she's earned it. She has worked really hard."

Sophomore wing Brit Jacobson poured in 24, and Decker contributed 13. Webb led the Lady Cardinals with 26.

K-State hits the road Tuesday to play Wichita State.

Loss to Colorado ends Wildcats' season

Shana Newell
staff writer

The women's volleyball team dropped its last match of the regular season Nov. 16 at Colorado.

Losing in three games, 15-12, 15-8, and 15-6, the Wildcats lost any chance of being invited to the NCAA tournament, which will begin later this week.

But postseason play is still in the minds of the Cats as they look toward the NIVC tournament Dec. 1-3 in Kansas City, Mo.

The Cats hit poorly against the Buffaloes as they hit .111, .065 and .000 in each game, but they were not dominated.

"I don't think Colorado played well at all," Coach Jim Moore said. "But we played perhaps our worst match of the season, and I really can't tell you why."

"It's hard to say because we had two phenomenal practices before the match, even after the loss to Oral Roberts," he said. "I am confident that if we had played our best, we would have defeated Colorado."

With the loss to Colorado, the Cats finished the regular season with a 19-10 record overall. The team finds itself fifth in the Big 8 with a 5-7 conference record.

Moore said not one individual K-State player stood out as a leader in the match.

"Nobody played well," he said. "Nobody played well enough to even step up. We tried to come out of it and pull ourselves up. The girls wanted to succeed. It just didn't happen."

In other volleyball news, Big 8 conference coaches released their choices for the 1995 Big 8 Conference Volleyball Postseason Honors. Two K-State players made the Second Team.

Juniors middle blocker Kate DeClerk and play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young represent the Cats in the conference, and Moore said it was a big honor for both players.

"Katie had an outstanding year. She was a national Player of the Week, and I think that she has proven that she can be a dominant player," Moore said. "She may not have been so dominant at the end of the season and that is something that we have to work on dealing with, but nevertheless she was dominant."

"This was the second year Toie has made the Big 8 team, and she has proven that she's an outstanding player," he said. "When she takes the floor you notice her, and she's someone other teams have to pay attention to."

► BETANCOURT PLACES 112th AT NCAA NATIONALS

K-State senior Irma Bentancourt finished the Wildcats' cross country season last week when she placed 112th at the NCAA Cross Country Championships in Ames, Iowa.

Bentancourt, a senior from Mexico City, was the only Cat to participate at the national meet.

"Cross country is a team sport, and it's hard to compete at nationals by yourself without that team support that a person is used to having during the season," K-State coach Terry Drake said.

"Irma had in her mind that she was going to make it right from the start of the season," Drake said. "She had her mind set on going, and I think all year she's proved that she was ready to do what it took to get in."

Bentancourt said she knew coming into the season she would have to work extra hard to make the NCAA Championships. That hard work began in the off-season with daily runs through the mountains of her native country.

With the cross country season over, Bentancourt will focus on the 1,500 and 3,000 meter races she will run during the spring track season and will prepare for a shot at making the Mexican Olympic Team.

Men come back to beat Bradley

Dan Lewerenz
sports editor

Three streaks were broken Saturday night when K-State defeated Bradley University 75-72 in overtime in front of 5,316 fans in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats (1-0) earned their first-ever win over the Braves — ending a two-game skid — and won their first season-opener since 1992. Bradley (0-1), on the other hand, suffered their first back-to-back losses (including last year's season-ending loss to Canisius University in the NIT) since dropping to DePaul and Oregon State in 1993.

K-State opened strong in the first half, jumping to a 10-2 lead in the first 2:17 of play. But the Cats were never able to control the game, and Bradley took its first lead of the game on a 3-point shot by Kleine with 1:26 remaining in the first half.

Both teams went into the break tied at 30-30.

Bradley coach Jim Molinari said his team had difficulty finding its shots in the first half.

"If you look at (Anthony) Parker, Chad and Aaron (Zobrist), they're good shooters," Molinari said. "But we went 2-of-8 in the first half from behind the arc."

The Braves found their shot in the second, pouring in the first 17 points of the half — including three 3-pointers from Zobrist — in the first 5:42 of the second.

"We went into one of our patented comas to start the second half," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "We just completely fogged out offensively."

Wildcat junior Anton Hubert said the Cats just couldn't get into the offense in the second.

"We weren't concentrating," Hubert said. "We had guys moving not to run the offense, but just to move."

But the Cats clawed their way back in, overcoming an 18-point deficit in the game's final 13:46.

"We just got after it and played a lot better and a lot smarter," Asbury said. "We just picked it up with defense, and that carried over into our offense."

The Cats were down by six going into the final minute. But a lay-up off a fast break by sophomore Mark Young cut the Braves lead to 64-60 with 40.9 seconds left. Parker hit one-of-two free throws to put Bradley up by five with 39.4 remaining. Then a trey by Hubert with 29.2 left — his second of the game — closed the gap to 65-63.

Parker hit a pair from the charity stripe at 27.3, but Hubert responded with a 19-footer from the right side to keep the spread at two. Bradley's Billy Wright hit one-of-two free throws with 12.7 seconds left.

But Hubert came up big again, nailing a trey with 3.9 seconds remaining to knot the score at 68-68 and send the game into overtime.

Hubert said Asbury gave him the confidence to hit the shot.

"I was shooting poorly in the practice games, but coach still wanted me to take the shot," Hubert said. "That gave me a lot of confidence."

The Cats took an advantage into the overtime — both of Bradley's starting forwards, Deon Jackson and Dwayne Funches, fouled out in regulation.

So K-State pounded the ball into the post, scoring its first four points on free throws off inside fouls, and fouling out Bradley center Adebayo Akinkunle in the process.

"They're pretty good down low," Molinari said. "They had a lot of weight, and they backed it."

"A pair of free throws by Paco May put the Cats up 74-72 with 31.2 remaining. Zobrist had a chance to give Bradley the lead, but his three-point attempt with 15.4 left went long, and Kleine's put back fell short, forcing Kleine to foul May with 4.8 seconds left.

May hit one-of-two free throws to make the score 75-72. Zobrist's desperation 3 fell short, giving the Cats the victory.

Senior Tyrone Davis led the Cats in scoring with 19 points, followed by 13 from Hubert and May's 10. Bradley's Parker led all scorers with 22.

Asbury said the game was good for the team.

"It was a great learning experience, and one where we were fortunate to come away with a win."

The Cats next see action Wednesday, Nov. 29, when they play host to Emporia State.

Government cuts put Kansas public radio through changes

Scott Allen Miller
contributing writer

Government cuts are forcing public radio in Kansas through a state of change.

Public broadcasting has traditionally relied on a combination of government, individual and corporate underwriting, or donations, to keep it running.

Congressional pressure could force the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, the quasi-governmental agency that oversees the distribution of funds to public broadcasters, to be phased out in the coming years.

If this happens, public broadcasters all over the country would have to make up those funds some other way.

KANU-FM 91.5 (FM 90.5 in Manhattan), a part of the University of Kansas, receives funding from both the federal government via the CPB and from the state through KU.

Radio Kansas, the network that operates KHCD-FM 89.5 in the Salina/Manhattan area, KHCC-FM 90.1 in the Hutchinson/Wichita area, and KHCT-FM 90.9 in the Great Bend/Hays area, receives funding from the federal government through the CPB and from Hutchinson Community College.

Both stations have lost funding from the governmental institutions that support them.

"These are permanent cutbacks," David Horning, general manager of Radio Kansas, said. "I hope it's going to plateau."

Horning claimed HCC has cut the station's support by about $300,000 during the fiscal years 1992-1996. He also said the network lost $70,000 in federal funding this year. Radio Kansas has an operating budget of about $1 million, Horning said.

Kathryn Weise, development director at KANU, said the amount of state funding has slipped to just more than 29 percent of KANU's $1.5 million budget, which is down from 30.63 percent.

She said federal funding, which now makes up 19 percent of KANU's budget, is projected to dip to 12 percent within the next three years.

"We're anticipating less support from both state and federal sources," she said.

These cuts come at a time when station operating costs have remained about the same and programming costs have gone up, Weise said.

Radio Kansas has resorted to cutting program offerings and services to offset the funding cuts, Horning said. The network is no longer an American Public Radio network affiliate.

Instead, Radio Kansas buys two weekly programs from Public Radio International (a subsidiary of Minnesota Public Radio that replaced APR) on an individual basis.

While National Public Radio News has remained at Radio Kansas, the network has cut its own award-winning regional news staff from three people to one. The station also has ceased issuing program guides to members, the people and businesses who donate funds to keep the station running.

Horning said Radio Kansas membership has increased 16 percent in the last 10 years and that listeners' contributions account for about half of the station's funding.

"It's really kind of an odd situation," Horning said. "We're one of the healthiest stations in the country from a membership standpoint, but we have to make program cuts because institutional funding has gone down."

Weise isn't sure what program cuts, if any, will be needed at KANU. She said she plans to direct much of the station's attention toward seeking funds from individual listeners as well as businesses and foundations in the future.

"Our emphasis is on getting more private support through individuals, corporations and foundations," Weise said. "The corporate market hasn't been tested in the Lawrence area yet."

She said she doubts if KANU will ever become a commercial radio station. She said listeners have faith in the station's programming because there are no true sponsors influencing the station's program content, citing controversial NPR News stories concerning Archer Daniels Midland Corporation, a CPB underwriter.

"ADM has been reported on by NPR even though they're an underwriter," Weise said. "This is what makes public radio unique. This is what we are."

One adaptation Weise said KANU is trying to make in order to survive is to make it appealing to younger listeners.

RATHBONE

growing is out the door. A new engineering library will be added outside of Durland Hall.

Rathbone said ground will be broken for the library in the late spring or early summer.

Money for the library will come from the fundraising and special fees engineering students pay.

Rathbone is the main fundraiser for the college.

Another part of the job Rathbone said he enjoyed was knowing and being involved with the alumni. He said he received tremendous support from them.

Challenges come with any job. Rathbone has seen a lot of those in his 22 years.

Establishing engineering at K-State as one of the most outstanding engineering schools in the region, establishing strong relationships with industries, developing the physical facilities so they would be some of the best in the United States and increasing the extramural support for research are some of the challenges Rathbone has had to face.

Rathbone laughed as he told about one of the roles of being a dean.

Two years ago, Tau Beta Pi, the national engineering honor society, had a convention at Purdue.

The K-State chapter of Tau Beta Pi wanted to compete to have the national engineering convention at Manhattan.

The students decided to do a skit for the competition. They made it a spoof of the "Murphy Brown" TV show, and they included Rathbone in the scenario. He was to be one of Murphy Brown's guests.

"We didn't win that year, but it set the stage. They eventually won, and the convention will be here in 1998," Rathbone said.

Even though Rathbone said he enjoyed his job, there is one thing he said he could do without — removing people from positions.

"It's one of the things that is least pleasant, but something you have to do," Rathbone said.

Rathbone is also involved in several community organizations.

"Dean Rathbone is unique because of his ability to work with people outside of academia," Munson said. "His leadership stands heads and shoulders above the rest."

Rathbone is a member of the Rotary Club and the Board of Directors for the Chamber. He is also the chairman of the Kansas Entrepreneur Center.

Rathbone has been Rotarian of the Year and Kansas Engineer of the Year, and he is in the Hall of Fame for the College of Engineering.

Linda Streeter is Rathbone's administrative assistant. She has worked with Rathbone for seven years.

"He is an outstanding dean of engineering nationally, highly respected by his peers and alumni and has the ability to give his all to many diversified activities," Streeter said.

Rathbone said he believed this University was outstanding.

"I have been impressed with the fact that we are moving forward," Rathbone said. "Everything is very positive."

avoid any legal issues with Spurs or confusion over affiliation.

"If we were going to use the Spurs name, we would have to pay dues to the national organization, so that's the biggest reason we made the change in the name," Martin said.

different farmers and ranchers run their operations," Barker said. "It was really interesting to hear them talk about their operations."

Schaake said the team's work ethic moved them to the top.

"They trained and practiced as hard as any team I've ever had," Schaake said. "It was the kind of team that started out with a goal to repeat the national championship."

Mullinix said he enjoys all the

The group had a brainstorming session to invent a new name and decided on Silver Key.

The key is a good symbol for leadership, and the new name fit in well with pre-existing campus organizations like Blue Key and Golden Key, Bartel said.

"This year, we'll probably call ourselves Silver Key, formally known as Spurs, in order to avoid confusion and to let people know that it is the same organization," said Carla Jones, assistant dean of student life and Silver Key adviser.

The new constitution has many of the same elements Spurs had, but members changed certain things to make it more specific to K-State.

"We're still keeping the spirit of Spurs," Jones said.

Silver Key, like Spurs, will recognize scholarship and leadership and will be active in community service.

aspects of livestock judging, but especially the competition.

"I've always been a fierce competitor. I hate to lose, whether it's sports or anything else," Mullinix said. "I think one thing I added to the team was my competitive spirit. It helped to drive the rest of the team."

Barker also said she enjoyed the competition, and one asset of the team was its competitive spirit.

"It was unique that all the members of the team were able to push one another. I pushed others, and they pushed me," Barker said. "There was always six, seven or eight people pushing you to be better."

Both Barker and Mullinix said above all else the best part about being on the team was the friendship.

"I'd like to think that 10 or 15 years from now I might forget about the contest, but I still want to have these friends," Mullinix said.

Livestock judging team members include Barker, Mullinix, Jeff Brandenberger, Kristopher Osborn, Chad Ward, Joe Leibbrandt, Carla Johnson, Warren Forbes, Scott Hatfield and Shelia Stannard.

The team has had 10 national titles during its 80-year existence.

She said the station's programming is diverse enough to attract listeners in their 30s, 40s and 50s.

The politics of the CPB funding debate are not lost on Horning or Weise.

Republicans in Congress, including Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., are leading the fight to eliminate the CPB on the grounds that public broadcasters should find funding from the private sector through donations or commercial sponsors instead of through the government.

Some have criticized public broadcasting as an elitist and politically liberal medium.

Horning believes the push to eliminate federal funding of public broadcasting in its current form has had a political price for some Republicans.

"I think this has lost them more than they thought," he said.

"Much of America cares about public broadcasting. It's gotten a lot quieter," Horning said.

Weise believes public broadcasting concerns some politicians because of the nature of public broadcasting stations' programming.

"They tackle tough issues," Weise said.

"Sometimes they're issues we'd rather not think about," she said.

Weise said that during KANU's fall membership drive, some listeners complained that the station's programming content was too liberal while others said the station's programs were too conservative.

Weise said every medium faces this dilemma.

"I think it's a healthy debate," she said.

Britain opposes use of Diana in condom ad

Associated Press

OSLO, Norway — An advertisement that used Princess Diana's admission of adultery to promote condom sales stirred protests from Britain and furious debate in Norway.

The newspaper ad showed a photograph of the British princess, wearing white, on one page. On the opposite page was the headline: "It's hard to see on the outside whether someone has had casual sex with casual partners."

"It happens in the best of families. One can never be too careful," said the ad for RSU condoms, published by the Oslo tabloid Dagbladet on Friday.

The ad appeared the day after Norwegian television aired a British Broadcasting Corp. interview in which the princess admitted to having been unfaithful to her husband, Prince Charles.

Norwegian newspapers reported Saturday that Buckingham Palace was furious about the advertisement, which used Diana's picture without permission.

"The palace has asked the British Embassy in Norway to consider possible reactions," according to palace press officer Charles Anson.

The advertisement also brought a sharp response in Norway. Former Prime Minister Jan D. Syse called it "evil-minded."

TWINS ON CAMPUS

For twins, adjusting to life at K-State can be a big change. People confuse them all the time. The problem is also compounded by the fact that some twins are members of different sororities or fraternities.

CLINTON

America to fight in Bosnia

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Seeking support for a risky military mission, President Clinton presented his case Monday night for sending 20,000 U.S. troops to enforce a fragile peace treaty in Bosnia.

"In the choice between peace and war," Clinton said "America must choose peace."

Without American force, the war will reignite, Clinton said.

"The slaughter of innocents will begin again," he said.

Despite misgivings, it appeared Congress would give Clinton his way. Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole said he believed in the constitutional authority of the president.

"No doubt about it, whether Congress agrees or not, troops will go to Bosnia," Dole said.

In a prime-time address from the Oval Office, Clinton acknowledged American troops will face danger and he assumed full responsibility for any casualties.

However, he laid down a marker to anyone threatening the peacekeepers.

"America protects its own. Anyone — anyone — who takes on our troops will suffer the consequences. We will fight fire with fire and then some," Clinton said.

He said a small number of American troops would go into Bosnia sometime next week to lay the groundwork for thousands more to come, probably before Christmas.

Gingrich says he won't seek GOP nomination

Associated Press

MARIETTA, Ga. — House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who had flirted with a presidential run for months, said Monday he would not be a candidate for the 1996 Republican nomination.

"Frankly, looking at the daunting challenge of trying to organize a national campaign, looking at what people like Bob Dole and Phil Gramm and Lamar Alexander have gone through, I didn't see how I could both be speaker of the House and be in a position to mount a campaign on that scale," Gingrich said at a news conference.

"My job as speaker is a pretty challenging one and one which has a tremendous opportunity to improve the quality of life for Georgia," he said.

Gingrich said he wouldn't endorse GOP front-runner Dole or any presidential candidate and that he hoped to be asked to chair the Republican National Convention.

DIPLOMAT TO SPEAK TODAY

After traveling the world working for the federal government, former U.S. Ambassador David Swartz will speak at 2 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Forum Hall.

In 1967, Swartz was a member of the U.S. State Department, where he served until his recent retirement in August.

As an affair specialist, Swartz spent time serving in the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and in the former Soviet Union. Swartz was the U.S. Consul General in Zurich, Switzerland and in Calgary, Canada. In addition, from 1984 to 1988, Swartz was the minister counselor at the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw, Poland.

In 1992, President Bush nominated Swartz to be the first U.S. ambassador to the Republic of Belarus, a state of the former Soviet Union. He served in that position until 1994.

The speech is going to be sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

The untitled alabaster sculpture was created by Felts. Works by both artists will be on display at the gallery until Dec. 1.

REVIEW

Artists use their work to heal

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

Finding peace within yourself, particularly during this religious holiday season, is something many people struggle with.

Achieving a balance of emotions, both good and bad, is something artists Valerie Felts and Chris Beardsley have struggled with over the four years of study at K-State.

Felts, a senior in pre-art therapy, said she chiefly concerns her artistic output in the therapeutic powers of art.

Her work, whether you like it or not, is not concerned with the final image, but the means of achieving that image — a basic process of art. Felts uses her art as a way of realizing aspects of her life such as her career, her family, which includes two daughters, and the fact she is a single mother.

Her pre-art therapy major, a balance of art and psychology, allowed Felts the opportunity to explore a variety of artistic mediums varying from watercolor, oil and sculpture.

"I feel art can help an individual," Felts said. "Using the works of art as therapy, you're more involved in what people are getting out of art and how they express themselves doing it, than with the end product."

Felts said she prefers more realistic work over non-representational, but she does experiment abstractly when

WILLARD SHOW

► The bachelor of fine arts show, featuring Chris Beardsley and Valerie Felts, will be showing in the Willard Gallery (room 116) until Dec. 1. Gallery hours are Monday through Friday, 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

she uses oils. Her work in oils is much stronger than her watercolors, which seem reduced to sentimental landscapes rather than outlets of genuine emotion.

Felts' sculpture, particularly "Exploring '559,'" an aluminum piece, is an amalgam of found objects and textural pieces. Segments of the sculpture seem to float apart from the mass providing a wonderful vantage point from any angle.

Her work, "Decisions," an oil painting, encompasses on a grand scale what Felts is experiencing as she graduates and looks forward in her life.

Three circles, symbolizing her and her two daughters, are surrounded by mountains which descend to a clear path which opens up and recedes into the distance.

Chris Beardsley, senior in art with an emphasis in painting, prefers working with watercolors to oil.

"I like the transparency and the different layers you can create with watercolor. You can do that with oil, but with watercolor you can create something real dense and opaque," she said.

Most of Beardsley's stronger work is a mixture of watercolor, ink, gesso, sugar and pastels.

Although her work, such as "Angiosse," takes on many non-representational, formal qualities of Helen Frankenthaler's work, Beardsley's work is rooted in her own life. Upon close inspection and a few dropped hints from the artist, one can see real depictions in her work, whether it be a figure or a landscape.

Beardsley said some of her work has evolved out of people she has lost in the past few years, such as young girl who died of leukemia.

"I paint it because the topic is at the forefront of my mind," she said. "When I'm painting it's relaxing for me. It's when I'm the happiest."

In her oil painting, "Journey Taken," Beardsley seems to echo Felts' work, "Decisions," offering an ambiguous depiction on where her life has taken her and where it might.

It has an abstract waterfall quality, descending beneath a strong arch, creating a path for the viewer to follow around the painting. Your eye keeps moving, following this "road" throughout the painting.

Who knows where this road will take Beardsley?

Local homes dressed up for holidays

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

Take a step back in time to seven of Manhattan's most prominent residences — decorated for the holidays during the Historic Homes Christmas Tour, Friday and Saturday.

The tour will include five private residences on Houston Street, plus the Lucile Wolf House Museum and the Isaac Goodnow Home, said Linda Glasgow, president of the Riley County Historical Society.

"Each home has its own personality and really reflects the tastes of the people who live there," said Jean Bigbee Hill, one of the tour's participants.

"I want people to see that the old homes are quite unique and possess their own charm, but that they can be made very livable. I want people to capture that spirit," Hill said.

"This will be a big event, with a major amount of time being donated by the community," she said.

Glasgow said about 150 people will be helping with the event, and some will be dressed in period costumes.

Hill said the homes on Houston Street were chosen because they are some of the oldest buildings in Manhattan and have architecture unique to the area.

"At the turn of the century, it was considered the street to live on," she said. "It was the first street paved in Manhattan, and the brick sidewalks were done in a herringbone pattern, which was a symbol of wealth, because it took more bricks and more skill."

Agri-Women focus on early ag education

Jonathon Yeomans

A glaring need to educate children about agriculture has caught the attention of K-State Collegiate Agri-Women.

When some children are asked where milk comes from they say it is from the grocery store, said Charlene Henton, faculty adviser for Collegiate Agri-Women.

The K-State chapter of Collegiate Agri-Women consist of 20 women interested in agriculture.

"This club is not restricted to ag majors," said Christine Emmot, senior in animal science and president of K-State's Collegiate Agri-Women. "It's for anyone who cares about agriculture."

Emmot was a founding member of Collegiate Agri-Women and was elected president in the spring.

The group is working with ideas and issues that originated with the construction of the constitution.

"It's basically a science fiction and fantasy fan club," said Guy Damrosch, senior in psychology and president of SMOF.

The group began in 1994 to get people with similar interests together, said Scott Bauer, a Manhattan resident and one of the SMOF founders.

"There really wasn't any type of club that dealt with fandom," Bauer said.

Fandom is any kind of activity related to speculative fiction, Scott Turnbull, senior in microbiology, said.

"We wanted to provide this so people could hook up with other people," Damrosch said.

The group tries to have a diverse level of activities to attract all types of members, Damrosch said.

5 MEN HOLD 2 OGDEN RESIDENTS AT GUNPOINT DURING ROBBERY

Two Ogden residents were robbed at gunpoint at 8:40 p.m. Nov. 21.

The aggravated robbery was reported at 8:53 p.m. Nov. 21 to the Riley County Police by a 911 call.

The victims, Daniel West and Eric Brown, were battered and robbed at gunpoint by five men in their home at 520 15th St. in Ogden.

West is a member of the 568 Engineers at Fort Riley. Brown is a Manhattan High School student.

Two of the suspects were armed with pump shotguns. West and Brown were held at gunpoint in a room during the robbery.

Two computers, a 27-inch RCA television and an RCA video cassette recorder were taken. Total loss was estimated at $4,730.

West and Brown received minor injuries, but the injuries did not require medical attention.

According to a press release from RCPD, the victims described the suspects as five black men.

Sgt. Stanley Conkwright with Riley County Crime Stoppers, said home security can be as simple as lighting and knowing the neighborhood.

"Lighting is one of the cheapest forms of security a person can ever buy," Conkwright said.

Using peep holes is another good way to keep your home safe, he said. Residents can look through the peep hole to make sure they know who is on the other side.

Strangers needing help should not be let in to use the phone. Instead, residents should ask for the phone number or offer to call the police, he said.

"If it's an unusual hour of the day or night, that's when you should be the most careful, especially with strangers," Conkwright said.

Making the house look inhabited is also a good safety measure. Turning on outside lights when it gets dark will increase visibility out windows and peep holes, he said.

"Do not hesitate to call law enforcement if you see, hear or smell anything out of the ordinary," Conkwright said.

Conkwright also does free home security surveys for interested home owners.

"I will go out and give them in writing what is good and bad about the security of their home," he said.

During the holidays, RCPD offers a vacation security check for home owners. RCPD will take down general information about the residence and then check the house regularly for up to two weeks.

The service is available through the administrative offices at 537-2112.

PSU PRESIDENT TO BE CHOSEN

TOPEKA (AP) — A professor, a consultant and a university provost are the finalists for the presidency at Pittsburg State University.

The Kansas Board of Regents plans to interview John Darling, Dale Nitzschke and George DePuy Friday and Saturday.

The board has scheduled a news conference for 2 p.m. Saturday to announce its choice.

Darling is a professor of international business at Louisiana State University. He served for five years as the chancellor of Louisiana State University at Shreveport, and he has been administrator at Mississippi State University, Texas Tech and Southern Illinois.

Nitzschke, the consultant, is a former president at the University of New Hampshire and Marshall University in West Virginia. He also taught and served as an administrator at the University of Northern Iowa and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. He now lives in Ohio.

DePuy is provost and vice chancellor for academic and student affairs for the University of Wisconsin's Stout and Menomonie campuses.

DRUG TO REDUCE TRANSPLANTS

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Food and Drug Administration has approved a new drug to fight one of the most lethal forms of leukemia.

Promyelocytic leukemia is fairly rare, affecting about 2,500 Americans, the FDA said. But it is one of the most aggressive forms, causing sudden and serious internal bleeding and rapidly advancing to become life-threatening.

Standard therapy is the cancer drug anthracycline, but it fails 75 percent of the time, said Dr. Ray Warrell of Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center. Those patients' last hope is a risky bone marrow transplant.

A study of 1,500 patients found Hoffman La-Roche's drug Vesanoid caused complete remissions in half of the leukemia sufferers who had relapsed after standard therapy, the FDA said.

Warrell said Monday's approval could largely eliminate bone marrow transplants for these patients.

Vesanoid, known chemically as all-trans-retinoic acid, works by causing the leukemia cells to age rapidly and die off. The body then replaces them with normal cells.

Federal Express pilots refuse to work overtime

Federal Express pilots will not be working overtime during the holiday season because of disputes with management.

Associated Press

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) — FedEx pilots are turning down overtime in a holiday-season dispute with management, and Monday they accused the cargo airline of trying to undercut their job security.

"The company wants to increase its ability to take away jobs from FedEx pilots," said Will Johnson, a spokesman for the Air Line Pilots Association.

Federal Express, in the midst of its first significant contract dispute with organized labor, announced a pay raise Sunday averaging 4 percent for its 2,950 pilots. The 22-year-old company also imposed new work rules the union contends will nullify those increases.

A federally mandated cooling-off period barring union job actions or work rule changes by FedEx ended at 12:01 a.m. EST Saturday.

Rather than strike, union leaders said pilots were working to the letter of all Federal Aviation Administration and company regulations during the Christmas season and refusing overtime.

FedEx, the world's largest overnight package delivery company, vowed to continue normal operations and warned pilots they could face disciplinary action, including dismissal, for a slowdown.

The pilots, who earn an average salary of $128,000, want a 17-percent pay raise over three years of a proposed work contract, but Johnson said money was not the most important issue being debated.

The company, he said, wants broader authority to contract with other shippers and hire non-FedEx pilots during peak shipping periods.

The slowdown could disrupt complex shipping schedules that are particularly important during the holidays when FedEx ships millions of packages throughout the country and abroad.

But Shirlee Clark, a company spokeswoman, said FedEx had not detected any big disruptions.

"Our operations over the weekend appeared normal," she said.

Paul Schlesinger, a market analyst with Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, said it was too early to tell whether the labor dispute had adversely affected the company's relations with its customers.

Johnson said union pilots, who account for about half of FedEx fliers, have been told to refuse overtime work until the company returns to the bargaining table.

Nonunion pilots also are requested to abide by that directive, Johnson said, although he had no immediate way of knowing how many would.

Pilots were negotiating for their first contract with FedEx since the ALPA won certification in 1993. Talks began in May 1994 and stalled last month, prompting the 30-day cooling off period. No new talks are scheduled.

Under the new raises, pilots' hourly pay will increase from 1.8 percent to 6.7 percent, with the largest going to veterans.

The company also said it was now assigning pilots to fly other routes if their scheduled flights were canceled.

"You get paid for that trip whether you sit at home or fly another trip. For the time we're already paying them, we're trying to have productive work," said Tom Martin, FedEx vice president for communications. Johnson said he disagreed.

"Since compensation is directly related to scheduling, you're going to have to work more for less money," he said.

In a letter to pilots, FedEx executive Ted Weise blamed the union for the confrontation, the Commercial Appeal reported Monday.

"Each of you must decide for yourself where you stand," he wrote.

"We'd hoped to spare you that decision, but in a way, it is better for us to find out now."

FedEx delivers nearly 2.4 million packages each working day. On its busiest day of last year's holiday season, it shipped 3.4 million.

Lafene might ask for $15 fee boost

Cristina Janney
city-government editor

Lafene Health Center will probably ask for an increase in the health fee next year.

Lannie Zweimiller, Lafene director, gave the Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee a proposal that asked for an increase in the health fee from $70 to $85 for full-time students next year.

Fees for services would also have to be increased by 10 percent. The preliminary recommendation from the Student Health Advisory Board is that there continue to be no charge for office visits at Lafene.

The health fee was reduced by $10 per semester for full-time students this year. This combined with enrollment decrease and a cyclical decrease in Lafene use resulted in a $435,000 loss in revenue for Lafene.

"The cut has caused us some financial problems," Zweimiller said. "It has forced us to look at our finances and what we need to do as far as hours, accessibility and user fees."

Lafene has been forced to make cuts due to the revenue losses.

The center has not filled several vacant positions, including positions for a doctor and nurse. Some evening and weekend hours at Lafene have also been cut.

Without the cuts, Lafene would not have had enough revenue to operate during the upcoming summer.

The Lafene student fee will be up for review by Senate next semester. Senate has considered making some fees user fees, which would mean that only students who pay for services would use them.

The committee discussed the possibility of charging for Lafene and University Counseling Center visits.

Zweimiller said he supported charging for office visits because this would generate revenue and increase equity between part-time and full-time students.

He said he had seen some students taking only one or two hours and paying the $25 part-time health fee just so they could use Lafene services.

Zweimiller said a $10 fee could raise $330,000 per year for the center.

"We are going to have to do

something," he said. "Students can either pay more or get less."

Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, asked if fees could be weighted for part-time students. He said part-time students pay less in fees but still have full access to campus services.

Zweimiller said it would be too complicated from a bookkeeping standpoint to graduate fees or charges according to full- or part-time status.

Citing a survey conducted of students who used Lafene during a three-day period in October, students on SHAC have opposed implementing charges for office visits.

Seventy-two percent of the students who responded to the survey said they would prefer an increase in health fees to a charge for office visits.

"The way I see it, I would rather pay an extra $35 when I write that $1,000 check for tuition than pay $10 to see a doctor in December when I have to buy Christmas presents and have other expenses," Melanie Chaffin, SHAC co-chair, said.

Counseling Services receives about $402,000 per year or 12 percent of the health fee.

Counseling Services already charges a $10 fee after five visits.

Fred Newton, Counseling Services director, said he did not know if increasing the fee would affect students' use of the center, but said many students seem to plan their counseling around the five-visit free limit.
